'His incredible charismatic presence'

Zubin, with anyone else," says Miriam Hartman, IPO co-principal violist. "It is almost like we have to relearn the piece, so ingrained are Mehta's nuances and interpretations in our music-making.

"There is also the factor of his incredible charismatic presence. It is not easy to control 120 different personalities all at once with such skill, and there are such genuinely good feelings between us."

Asked to comment on the relationship between himself and the orchestra, Mehta quietly points out that all is not love and roses. "These guys are very fine professionals. When I am here, the orchestra members demand 100 percent of my attention at rehearsals and concerts, just as I demand 100 percent of theirs," he says.

"One must realize that conducting is more than just beating time. Communication is the key. The conductor has to communicate all aspects of the music, such as tempo, pathos, energy, dynamics, rhythm and nuances to the musicians. Even though much of it is written in the music, you still have to remind and insist."

And Mehta takes that task to heart. "I am firm in my belief that the one who insists the most is the one who gets the results," he says. "The conductor has to have an overall vision of how the music should sound and be listening intently, because those playing the notes may not be listening as resolutely. If you let it go, the musicians might be pleased, but the result is not the same."

But this principle doesn't apply as rigidly to solos, says the maestro. "On the other hand, as a conductor I have to be flexible to the vision of the soloist or solo player in the orchestra, even if their vision does not completely coincide with my own, and give him or her the liberty to play it as wished. However, the overall vision for the music has to be mine," he says.

"Music is always moving and going somewhere. Sometimes it enters a tunnel; I have to see the light at the end of that tunnel and guide them through."

Guiding the IPO has been an integral part of his life. Even in times of war and crisis, Mehta has cancelled other obligations and hurried to be at the orchestra's side and lend encouragement.

Although on sabbatical next season, he says he will still be very involved by phone or fax when artistic decisions are made. For example, music selection is one issue he and the orchestra decide together.

"I was trained in America, and American music directors need to have a large repertoire and tastes which encompasses many centuries because they do so many concerts," he points out.

In his 13 years with the New York Philharmonic, Mehta won ASCAP's first prize for the most imaginative 20th-century programming – five times. But the conductor says American and Israeli audiences differ in their aural preferences.

"Here in Israel, the public is very conservative and the orchestra, which receives scant government subsidies, is scared – perhaps too much so – that they will lose audience members," he says. "It follows, unfortunately, that we do not do much modern music. I have to really fight for the pieces that we do play, and perhaps now is the time to push a bit more."

Mehta's IPO involvement will even compel him to take a break in his sabbatical year and take the orchestra to Kath-

Having and spending money: a Jewish perspective

By MEIR TAMARI
Special to The CJN

The possession of money and the satisfaction of economic wants are a real "need" of people and so it is dealt with in Judaism in exactly the same way as are all man's other needs, such as sex, food, clothing, and the like.

They are all legitimate, provided they operate within a certain framework, the parameters of which are laid out clearly in the morality literature, in halachic decisions and the lives of those we see as role models for a holy people. However, Judaism views the economic and monetary needs and wants as the most powerful of all and therefore we have more mitzvot surrounding them, than say kashrut.

Meir Tamari

On the surface, much of the source material deals with what seems to be unsophisticated economies; irrelevant to today's sophisticated stock markets, high-tech industries, telecommunications and the post-industrial economy in which we live. Yet, even a casual glance at our society will show that the basic issues have not really changed.

The greed and jealously that led to strife and bloodshed ages ago, still exist. Man's insatiable desire for wealth still controls him and therefore has to be dealt with. Just as the issues remain the same, so too, the Torah's answers are the same.

What is required is to translate the texts so that their relevance to the modern economy is revealed. Not only will this help to understand the challenge which halachic rulings and sources present to behaviour in the modern market-place, but the answers they provide will also help meet the challenge of wealth in general.

The talmudic dictum "He who wishes to achieve saintliness should study the [mishnaic] order of Nezikin [Jewish tort, commercial and civil and criminal law]," makes Judaism's understanding of the spiritual effect of economic behaviour quite clear.

Furthermore, Pirkei Avot, considered to be a prime repository of the moral and theological wisdom of Judaism, was placed not in those orders of the Mishnah dealing with prayer, the Shabbat and Festivals, or the Temple and its ritual, but in the economic order of Nezikin.

The Sages, however, understanding the spiritual issues involved, provided an alternative name for Nezikin – Sefer Hayeshuot, the Book of Redemption. This halachic treatment of wealth has created a Jewish economic man whose business affairs, despite the myths perpetuated by detractors and enemies, have been conducted according to the highest demands of morality and ethics. For example, the well-known role of Jews in banking throughout the ages, is testimony to the trust of their non-Jewish depositors.

Judaism views economic evils as the beginning of the destruction of both Jewish and non-Jewish societies. The biblical commentators, discussing the sin of Sodom, argue, inter alia, that the reason for the cities' destruction was their refusal to share their wealth with others, while the fate of the Generation of the Flood was sealed, according to Chazal, by the sin of theft.

The chassidic Admor of Sochochow, the Shem MiShmuel, explains, that even though they sinned all three major sins – idolatry, adultery, and bloodshed – it is theft which is the beginning of the unravelling of the entire social fabric and leads to the three major sins. Therefore, it was theft that led to their destructio

In the Jewish world, the same centrality of economic morality applies. The Talmud Yerushalmi ascribes the reason for the destruction of the Second Temple to the fact that that generation loved money. This is an unveiling of the Bavli's reason that they placed everything on the law, never waiving their property rights.

mandu, Nepal, in November for a special fund-raising event. Undoubtedly, this trip will be the source of more "Zubin and the IPO tales," which are legendary in the annals of the orchestra's history.

Violist Hartman points out that most of the orchestra members have a special story associated with Mehta. She and the other American IPO members remember when they were singled out and feted by Zubin and his wife, Nancy, at a special Thanksgiving dinner celebration in the town of Nagano, Japan.

"The IPO was touring Japan 13 years ago," Mehta recalls. "Nancy, realizing the holiday would fall during our tour, bought all the provisions for a traditional Thanksgiving dinner in Tokyo. Then, while we were in Nagano on Thanksgiving Day, she convinced the hotel owners – who never let anyone into their kitchen – to allow her to cook everything from the turkey to the mince pies for us and the 14 Americans from the orchestra. It was unbelievable!"

Together, the orchestra members have "a store" of other "wonderful experiences" like the one in Nagano, says Mehta. "In Israel this past July, we presented a series of Johannes Brahms concerts, concluding with a marathon day of chamber music played by IPO members. I sat there the whole day listening and feeling so proud because the many members of this orchestra play this music – which is technically difficult and musically challenging – so well," he says.

"The finale of this marathon was the Symphony No. 4. When we finished, the audience stood there screaming – and Israeli audiences do not, as a rule, scream," he says. "This public was special. The box office planned for 800 and 2,000 came during the day. They came to be enthralled and rejoice with us."

While the world-renowned conductor has done and seen much musically, he still looks forward to one special goal coming true. "My dream is to bring the Israel Philharmonic to Cairo and Amman, so new audiences can meet them and enjoy their music," he says.

While looking forward to the coming year's challenges, Mehta says his thoughts will remain at home while he's away.

"I am going to miss the IPO, on both an individual and collective level," he says. "In addition to the joy of making music we share, I guess we just love foretelling the destruction of the First Temple and the beginning of the galut, with all that entailed, attribute both to social and moral evils, to the theft and avarice which had become rampant.

Four Attitudes to Wealth

It is simply not possible to have an ethical and moral business or economic life without first determining one's attitude to wealth. The Jewish attitude is drawn in this paper from a mishnah in Pirkei Avot (Chap. 5 Mishnah 10).

Mine is mine and yours is yours – that is the mark of the average person.

Actually, there seems to be nothing negative about this statement. This person respects his property, does not use it to injure others, and will not steal or damage other people's possessions. Yet all the Mishnah can credit him with is "the mark of an average man" – not criminal, but not very exciting spiritually.

Even though the Torah has laws protecting property from theft and damage, Judaism never accepts the concept that there is unlimited private property. A person's property is his but not merely his; it is meant to provide for his needs and those of his family, but also be used to assist others.

This Jewish obligation to help others is not left up to the free will of the individual, not solely a matter of compassion, mercy, or personal feelings. Just as prayer or sexual morality is not left to the judgement of the individual, to be observed whenever or if ever the spirit moves one, but is translated into permitted and forbidden actions, so too, assistance to the weak, the poor, the inefficient or even the lazy, cannot be relegated to the sphere of individual conscience.

The community has the right to tax the individual for that purpose. The moral basis for taxation for this purpose lies in the belief that this is one of the reasons God gives men wealth. Samson Raphael Hirsch comments that the reason we are not allowed to take interest on money which we lend to other Jews, is that God gave us such money so we should be able to help others.

An educational basis is required

Legal action alone, however, cannot create a moral and ethical society. It requires an educational basis and a commonly accepted value structure to be efficient and effective. So for example the Sepher HaChinuch writes, "God wanted the Jews to develop merits of mercy, so that they should become used to helping others, to become used to giving away something that actually belonged to them. [This has to be done continually teaching the practice of mercy. At the same time, the educational process alone is not enough to guarantee assistance to the poor. Education may simply create good but unfulfilled intentions.]

"So we are obligated to perform actions that will train us until these merits become second nature. A person who actually leaves the pe'ah of his field acquires a generous soul; through this mitzvah he learns to be generous to people."

Mine is mine and yours is yours – some say that is the mark [of the people] of Sodom.

"Yours is yours and mine is mine" is saying that in Sodom the people refused to acknowledge that they had an obligation to help others. In Sodom they said, "I do not care what happens to you, whether you are poor, or old or weak. While I will not steal from you, neither will I help you."

Close examination of the language of the first part of the Mishnah reveals an interesting idea that might not come through in the English translation. When an individual says, "What's mine is mine and what's yours is yours; I have no financial obligation to you," society can exist. But "yesh omrim," when everybody says, "What's mine is mine and what's yours is yours," that society has accepted a concept of absolute private property.

In Sodom, economic evil went far beyond the selfishness or crimes of marginal individuals – the whole society became corrupt and had to be destroyed. It was not the individual act of inhospitality which characterized Sodom, but the collective refusal to utilize wealth to alleviate suffering. So the whole society of Sodom abandoned the concern for the unfortunate, the inefficient, and the stupid. In the Jewish view, such a selfish society is doomed.

The effect of "what's mine is mine," is the ideological preparation for a society in which institutionalized theft and legalized inhumanity flourish.

'Judaism has always aimed at educating and sanctifying human nature'

Mine is yours and yours is mine – that is the mark of an ignorant man.

This attitude sounds basically like a very moral one and has been the basis of many utopian societies, including the Israeli kibbutz movement and European communist economies.

While the sages did not see it as wrong, they maintained in the Mishnah that it is not characteristic of the ideal Jewish economic society. They viewed it, instead, as the mark of an ignorant man, not evil or wrong, but ignorant; proposing a society which rejects the concept of private property goes against human nature.

Rather than attempting to destroy the yetzer hara, Judaism has always aimed at educating and sanctifying human nature. Philosophically, attempting to destroy a yetzer hara, rather than shaping it to operate in a spiritually elevated framework, calls into question God's creation of this yetzer, as well as the Torah He gave to educate it.

Practically, such attempts have shown themselves to be failures, usually creating new abuses to replace those they came to correct. The experience of the last 50 years has shown that changes in the economic system brought by socialism and communism in various countries, do not eliminate moral problems. These changes have admittedly solved some social problems, but they have also given rise to other, no less serious moral issues.

Weights from Hellenistic period (4th century B.C.E.) found in Ashkelon (Israel Dept. of Antiquities. Min. of Education and Culture. Jerusalem)

Private property rights not only make for economic efficiency, as evidenced by the performance of free market economies relative to socialist ones, but also have been shown to be necessary for a viable economic morality.

Morality presupposes rights and obligations. So private property rights mean that the individual is responsible not only for earning wealth, but also for preventing it from damaging others, and for patterns of consumption. In this way, the owner cannot escape responsibility for the social and communal effects of wealth, nor can this responsibility be transferred to some amorphous group.

Mine is yours and yours is yours – that is the mark of a

The voluntary renunciation of private property, lacking in the ignorant man, characterizes the Godly personality, while his ability to say, "Enough," distinguishes him from the evil person.

His saying, "Mine is yours," separates him from the people of Sodom and places him higher than the mediocre. He does not abandon his property, but is willing to place it at the disposal of others. There is no idealization of poverty here, no other-worldly philosophy, but rather, a correct use of wealth.

He is prepared to give up claims against others, despite the fact that he is not legally obligated to do so, lifnim meshurat hadin – beyond the demands of the law. The most significant halachic expression of this moral stance is, ze nehene ve ze lo chaser – "one has a benefit and the other does not lose" [by a transaction].

This dictum permits one to benefit from another's property provided that the owner does not suffer a loss thereby. The law of bar metzrah, gives owners of adjacent property the right of first refusal, when one intends selling his field. The neighbour has a benefit, since this gives him a larger unified tract of land with all the consequent efficiencies, while the owner suffers no loss, since he receives the market price for his field.

Fair weights are demanded by Jewish law. An early example is the above dome-shaped shekel weight found at Tel Azekah, dating from the First Temple period (930-586 B.C.E.) (Israel Dept. of Antiquities. Min. of Education and Culture, Jerusalem)

A Godly person is also exemplified by strict adherence to his verbal promises and written contracts. The rabbis saw immorality even in those cases where no losses occurred as a result of breaking one's word. Where one paid money for an article but did not take possession, even though no change of ownership has yet taken place, any party who recants on the deal does an act not befitting a Jew.

This applies to both the seller and the buyer. Whoever recants on an agreed-upon deal, even if he only paid part of the purchase price, is liable for the rebuke of "He who demanded payment" – mi shepara [even though no loss is involved].

The guilty party is arraigned in the Bet Din and the rabbis publicly rebuke him by saying, "He who demanded payment [for their sins] from the Generation of the Flood and the Generation of the Tower of Babel, and from the people of Sodom and 'Gemorrah, and from the Egyptians who were drowned in the Red Sea, He will repay whoever does not keep his word."

Yours is mine and mine is mine – that is the mark of an evil person.

It is important to note that in describing the evil man, the Mishnah tells us not of one who takes other people's property, but only of one who considers other people's property as his own.

This is paralleled by an injunction in the Ten Commandments, "Thou shalt not covet," which is also an injunction against a thought process. The coveting of another's property is actually the real beginning of immoral economic acts, since

The last days of Israel

By DR. MICHAEL GORDON
Reprinted with permission from the Medical Post V36. NO. 21.

A Canadian doctor recalls how he learned a lesson in hope as he was stuck in an Arab nation – and heard of the destruction of Israel – during the Six Day War.

I was lying on a mattress on the floor in a small house in Hammam Sousse, a Tunisian village, slowly turning the dial on the shortwave radio, searching for English words in the crackling reception. My sister Diti, a Peace Corps worker, slept as I tried desperately to find news about the war in Israel. Arab broadcasts described utter destruction in the land I had just left after working as a medical intern at Haifa's Rambam and Jerusalem's Hadassah hospitals. It was June 1967.

I heard static or unintelligible Arabic broadcasts. I peered at the perfectly black sky, with bright stars like those I had seen in Eilat when I slept on the beach shortly before leaving Israel. Could it be that Israel was being destroyed under this black and starry night? Sleep was fitful, with images of Israel in flames. The details of the successful battles provided for two days by English-language Radio Egypt haunted me. They detailed the destruction of towns, armies and the air force. But I am running ahead of myself. How did I arrive at this place at this time and why am I telling this story?

For most Jews and for many North American non-Jews, the Israel-Arab Six Day War evokes a sense of triumph and exhilaration, as reflected by the entry to the Western Wall of victorious soldiers led by Israeli defence minister Moshe Dayan. For me, the war was a frightening and dreadful experience. At its outbreak, I was in an Arab country and hearing of the destruction of Israel for two days, with no countervailing knowledge.

Having graduated from St. Andrews University Medical School in Scotland in 1966, I travelled to Israel to pursue a few months of internship, fulfilling my desire to return after my previous one-month experience as a medical student. Three weeks prior to departure, I visited a friend who lived on a kibbutz bordering Egypt's Sinai peninsula. We talked to patrolling Indian UN troops. There was belligerent rhetoric coming from Egypt's president, Gamal Abdel Nasser, and massive troop mobilizations, but we assumed the borders would not be violated. Two weeks later Nasser ordered the UN troops removed and defiantly and provocatively closed the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping on May 23, 1967.

I flew to Tunis on June 3. I took a slow, steaming bus trip to Hammam Sousse, and from there I was accompanied by numerous small children to Diti's house. They followed me like the Pied Piper, their smiling faces shouting "Diti" as they engulfed me.

Later, we went to the Peace Corps office, where I met Diti's fellow workers. The talk was of Nasser's latest threats and the mobilization of other Arab nations. No one believed that war with beleaguered Israel was likely. On June 4, Diti and I visited a neighbouring tourist resort. We returned to the Peace Corps office. The situation seemed grim.

By morning, the Peace Corps office was abuzz. War had broken out between Israel and the Arab countries. We could hear only an Egyptian station in English and local Arab broadcasts. Diti's shortwave radio needed batteries. We found batteries in a bicycle shop and I bought the whole box.

At the office, I heard Egypt's account of Israel's losses, all the time accompanied by martial music. The BBC was scrambled. At home I put in the batteries and sought English broadcasts. The whining shortwave sounded, screeching and whistling but I could get nothing but Cairo Rose, Egyptian broadcasts in English. Details of the battles were described with vivid accounts of the destruction of military units and the massive Egyptian successes.

'I could not believe what was happening'

The next morning, the news sounded worse. The local newspaper had stories of Egyptian victory. Local stations echoed Egyptian reports. I could not believe what was happening and could not imagine what my Israeli friends were experiencing. The many air raid shelter signs on Israeli houses had reminded me of the shelter signs I grew up with during the 1950s in Brooklyn, N.Y., when a Soviet nuclear attack was the great fear. Now Israelis were crouched in shelters as Israel was being pummelled. On a visit back to Sousse, Diti and I noticed many soldiers. Diti was told by a street vendor that they were Algerian soldiers on their way to the "great battle" in the east. We walked to the railroad bridge and saw an endless train of camouflaged tanks. I felt terror.

Late that night, June 6, I slowly turned the radio dial. Through the screeches I heard singing in Hebrew. Despite almost five months in Israel, my Hebrew was rudimentary, but I could recognize the language and the Hebrew songs that I had heard played on every Israeli bus radio in between news broadcasts. An accompanied Hebrew singer gently finished her song. I held my breath as I listened.

A radio voice came on, like those I had heard while sitting in buses or cafés. I knew it meant the news: "He nee ha chadashot." I could not understand every word. The announcer calmly recited the news: "...ma'ot migim v'shtem esrei miragim..."

My mind struggled to remember: "ma'ot" was "hundreds" I remembered from bargaining in the food market. Then it made sense: "migim" was the plural for MiG, the Russian fighter planes used by the Egyptians. I recalled that "shtem esrei" was 12. I remembered that the Mirage were the French fighters that Israel used because their purchase had been controversial. The words revolved in my head.

I could not make out other details. Then the singing began again, and the distant Hebrew melody faded.

It was 10 a.m. on June 7 when I clearly heard the familiar BBC World Service. The announcer dryly described conflicting stories from the Middle East. Egypt claimed to have destroyed more than 700 Israeli aircraft. Israel reported destruction of Egyptian and Syrian air forces, with rapid movement into Sinai and fierce tank battles taking place.

After providing the statistics, he noted that the total Israeli air force was estimated to contain 400 planes, which meant that Egypt was reporting destroying 1½ times the number of planes in the Israeli air force. I decided to fly back to Paris and return to Israel.

'There is always a flicker of hope'

Diti and I had an emotional goodbye. At the Air France office in Paris, students sat with knapsacks and luggage. The news was of Israel advancing on all fronts, reaching the Suez Canal with the air force in control. Egypt was requesting a ceasefire. East Jerusalem had been taken by the Israelis, but fighting persisted in the Golan Heights. No flights to Israel. I flew to London to visit Steve, my best friend from university, who was waiting to fly to Israel.

BBC Television described battles in the north, the UN discussions for a ceasefire and Israel's justification for the pre-dawn pre-emptive air strike that obliterated the combined Arab air forces. Egypt erroneously claimed that 1,500 planes were involved in the attack, and therefore that foreign forces must have participated. While I was hearing about the destruction of Israel from Cairo Rose, the Egyptian air force had been demolished and Israeli tanks were engaged in Sinai in the heaviest tank battles since World War II.

The late BBC news on June 9 focused on the UN's debate about the Golan Heights. The next day was a lovely day. No flights to Israel for me and Steve. We walked to Hampstead Heath where a cricket game was being played. I asked Steve how people could play cricket when there was a war going in the Middle East.

We doubled back to catch the mid-day news. The Golan was captured and a ceasefire agreed to. The Russians did not militarily support their allies. Israel had triumphed over the combined Arab armies and was in control of extensive territories.

I had experienced both the loss of Israel and its revival. I had for two days tried to come to terms with what my world would be like without that country and what it would mean to world Jewry. It was unimaginable. That distant song in Hebrew, in the middle of a Tunisian night, convinced me there was hope. Israel was not destroyed nor doomed as had been the fate of so many of the country's forbearers decades earlier. Israel had fought back and survived.

I often reflect on those few days in 1967 and draw strength as a doctor from my knowledge that even dealing with death, there is always a flicker of hope.

Two years later I immigrated to Israel. I became an Israeli air force medical officer, serving during the War of Attrition, which preceded the Yom Kippur war. My duties included helicopter medical evacuations.

ORTHODOX, CONSERVATIVE, REFORM, AND RECONSTRUCTIONIST RABBIS...
HAVE ISSUED A DECLARATION OF PEACE WITH CHRISTIANITY.
WOW!
NOW IF WE COULD GET ORTHODOX, CONSERVATIVE, REFORM, AND RECONSTRUCTIONIST RABBIS...
...TO ISSUE A DECLARATION OF PEACE WITH EACH OTHER?...
AMERICA HAS COME SO FAR THAT THE IDEA OF A JEWISH VICE-PRESIDENT IS NOT SUCH A BIG DEAL!
SO?
SO WHY DOES IT FEEL LIKE SUCH A BIG DEAL?
BY PULLING THE ISRAELI ARMY OUT OF LEBANON...
BARAK DID WHAT THE PEOPLE OF ISRAEL WANTED.
OF COURSE THAT DOESN'T MEAN THAT WE WON'T
BLAME HIM FOR IT... LATER.
SERIOUS ISRAELI DEMONSTRATIONS AGAINST A GOLAN WITHDRAWAL...
...HELP TO STRENGTHEN BARAK'S HAND IN NEGOTIATIONS!
SO PEOPLE WHO WANT TO HELP BARAK SHOULD DEMONSTRATE AGAINST HIM?
EXACTLY!
SO WHAT SHOULD FOLKS WHO OPPOSE BARAK DO?!

Jewish and proud of it, in Bangkok

By TIBOR KRAUSZ
Special to The CJN

Bangkok seems just about as far as you can get from New Jersey, where Rabbi Yosef Chaim Kantor had, as a rabbinical student in Brooklyn, once envisioned a placid ministry for himself. But he has risen to the challenges of a city with its trademark massage parlors and go-go bars, notoriously cheap dope, and myriad other temptations of Oriental exotica.

A Lubavitch Chassid in Bangkok may seem as unlikely as a Buddhist monk at Jerusalem's Western Wall. And it certainly appeared so to Kantor and his pretty, young, Montreal-born wife Nechama, when they first arrived in Bangkok. They found a bustling, sweltering tropical city with barely a hint of Jewish life, but all the more of Thailand's sensual offerings.

Sure, there was a synagogue in town, but no permanent rabbi, and the "community" of some 200 disconnected families of resident gem merchants and the thousands of passing-through Jewish travellers enjoyed little in the way of Yiddishkeit.

"It looked disheartening," Kantor, 31, recalls. "But we were dedicated to do God's work anywhere." At first, this meant having to rent rooms in guest houses to hold services.

But that was back in 1993. Now Bangkok's Chabad boasts Chabad Houses in a busy backpacker district of Bangkok, in rural northern Thailand and in nearby Nepal. Chabad operates three Orthodox synagogues in Bangkok, a kosher restaurant and shop, and a Jewish kindergarten. And it has its own Web site.

Rabbi Kantor employs two dozen Thai helpers, and has, over the years, "imported" three rabbis from Israel to help him in his missions. The rabbis, for example, visit Jewish prisoners in Bangkok's central prison serving life sentences for drug smuggling, to give them spiritual counselling and bring them kosher food.

Every day, Rabbi Kantor traverses the chaotic steamy streets of Bangkok – with its motorized rickshaws, car and motorcycle deluges, saffron-robed Buddhist monks, and occasional elephants – calling on community members to put on tfillin with them. "We want people to feel proud of being Jewish, as every Jew is precious to God," he explains.

Not surprisingly, Rabbi Kantor's undertakings cost money – lots of it. Thailand's Chabad operates on a budget of $700,000 (all figures US), no chicken feed for an organization running on goodwill.

Chabad's head office in Brooklyn's Crown Heights designates new destinations from Cape Town to Buenos Aires, and appoints rabbis for the postings, but leaves them alone to run the place on their missions of faith. Kantor describes Chabad missionaries, or shlichim, as "emissaries of the Rebbe," the late Menahem Mendel Schneerson, who originated Chabad in a bid to convey God's love and a love of God to every Jew worldwide.

Chabad now runs branches in more than 100 countries, with some 4,000 dedicated emissary couples like the Kantors. And Chabad shlichim had better earn their own daily bread.

The Kantors' income comes mostly from Chabad's kosher restaurant in a Bangkok tourist district and the wages the rabbi gets for supervising El Al's local kosher kitchens. But that still leaves Bangkok's Lubavitch community $25,000 short for every month of the year, which Rabbi Kantor has to make up from private donations.

"If we aren't active and reaching people, we don't eat," he sums up.

So when he doesn't cater to the spiritual needs of Bangkok's Jews, Rabbi Kantor is making the moneyed rounds of local businessmen to convince them to sponsor particular Chabad programs. Many willingly reach into their pockets to pay for communal Shabbat dinners or finance the Jewish kindergarten. The wealthier may shell out $50,000 on occasion.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5761

'Reward of a mitzvah is the mitzvah itself'

Why do people give? Because they get something in return that money can't normally buy: peace of mind. Rabbi Kantor sees Chabad activists as "alchemists of the soul" who "turn the donor's sweat and toil into a spiritual experience."

He explains: "Jews like to give to good causes, and what better cause than preserving Jewish identity?"

And the spiritual worth of donations isn't measured by the number of zeros after the first numeral. Sitting behind his paper-cluttered desk in his frugally furnished office, with posters of the late Rebbe and stacked cartons of kosher tuna lining the walls, Rabbi Kantor, an energetic man with cropped thick hair and a bushy beard, reaches for a folder and fishes out a letter he received last year. It's from an elderly man in Washington, D.C. who was, during a holiday in Thailand, once a guest at a weekly communal Shabbat dinner at the Kantors' home.

Enclosed with his letter was a cheque for $21.50, the content of a wine jug he had used for collecting loose one-cent coins. "My wife stacked the pennies and I put them into the wrappers, 43 rolls in all," the man wrote the rabbi. "I hope you can put it to good use."

Such tokens of appreciation are what motivate Rabbi Kantor. "Living on the edge and seeing people do their best to help gives you the drive never to flag, but always to try something new." Hence the new Chabad outpost in Chiang Mai, a picturesque town in rural northern Thailand with a small community of Jewish gem merchants.

And hence, also, the live-in yeshiva Kantor is starting on the grounds of Chabad's Bangkok headquarters as an experiment in secular-religious understanding through getting Israeli yeshiva students and secular backpackers to study together for a week in a relaxed environment.

But his ultimate inspiration? The spiritual rewards of good deeds performed for fellow Jews. "The rabbis taught us that the reward of a mitzvah is the mitzvah itself," says Rabbi Kantor. And every new day in Bangkok may earn Chabad another mitzvah.

He recounts a favourite anecdote: Last November, David and Suzie Keen, an Englishman and his American-born wife, who are both non-observant Jews and Bangkok residents, were expecting their first child – a boy, as medical tests showed.

One day, as the woman was nearing delivery, she began urging her husband to start making the arrangements for the circumcision – and fast. "Do you think," David Keen retorted, "you just bump into a mohel walking down the street in downtown Bangkok?"

He did – the next day. Keen was sitting in a cafe when he glimpsed Rabbi Chezki Lifshitz, one of Kantor's assistants, sauntering down the walkway in his full Orthodox outfit. Keen ran out to him. "Rabbi, do you know a mohel?" he demanded eagerly.

"But I am a mohel!" replied Rabbi Lifshitz, surprised. Two weeks later, the couple had the circumcision of their newborn son.

If the story sounds like one from a new edition of "Chassidic Tales," it's no accident. Rabbi Kantor, trusting in Providence, doesn't believe in chance. "God works his miracles every day," he explains.

"Just recently, I had a strange impulse to visit a community member to put on tfillin together. He'd started putting on tfillin daily half a year before. 'I just dropped by to say hi and give you some thoughts from the Torah,' I told him.

"'Rabbi,' he replied, 'I stopped putting on tfillin yesterday because ever since I started doing it my business has gone from bad to worse.'

"'David,' I said, 'You tell me what the chances are of my coming to see you the very day after you stopped putting on tfillin. God is missing your tfillin and urged me to inspire you to continue.'"

'City rewards you in a way no other place could'

Banging a clenched fist into an open palm, Rabbi Kantor delightedly concludes his story: "After 15 minutes, David was putting on tfillin again. Talk about perfect timing!"

But Bangkok's greatest mitzvah generator is Rabbi Nehemia Wilhelm, who caters to legions of Israeli backpackers on Bangkok's Khao San Road, a budget tourist destination of international fame – or notoriety, depending on your taste.

Khao San has it all for young people who want to let go. In vogue are eyebrow, nose and belly-button piercings, exotic henna tattoos, and flesh-baring loose tie-died skirts, shorts and shirts.

Khao San offers dozens of neon-lit massage parlors and bars with fetching Thai women looking for foreign "boyfriends." Drugs are easy buys, and Israeli travellers number heavily among the crowd of revellers.

So what is a haredi rabbi doing in Khao San's debauchery of thumping techno beats and fried larva snacks? He's inviting Israeli passers-by to join him in his evening prayers or at the approaching Shabbat dinner.

More remarkably, many Israelis do join Rabbi Wilhelm. His minyan is always complete in Khao San's Chabad House, and his Shabbat tables in a nearby hotel are crammed with some 300 people every Friday.

But the rabbi, whom his proteges fondly call Rabbi Nehemia, remains modest about the crowds he draws. "Travellers do me a great favour by praying, putting on tfillin, and spending Shabbat with me. Most of them would never do these things at home," he says.

In return, Rabbi Wilhelm helps them out. He lends money to cash-strapped travellers, assists with communication between parents and their wandering offspring, and counsels backpackers.

Every November, rabbis Wilhelm and Kantor organize a reunion of Bangkok veterans in Jerusalem, drawing a crowd of some 1,000 ex-backpackers. "In Israel," Rabbi Kantor explains, "we need to touch base again and rekindle that spark of happiness about being Jewish."

So has Bangkok been worth Rabbi Kantor's efforts? "Bangkok has its challenges," he admits. "But the city rewards you in a way perhaps no other place could."

Rabbi Kantor makes provision for the long haul in Bangkok. Yet he expects to get called back soon. "The Messiah is coming any day now, and we just have to complete the final touches for his arrival – one more act of goodness and kindness," he says. "That's what the Rebbe said, and that's what I believe."

'Only by educating people is it possible to achieve a moral, economic society'

it is that need, that lust, that jealousy that leads one to steal or injure another's wealth.

Basically, theft, robbery, and exploitation flow from coveting the wealth of our neighbours, rather than from actual abject poverty. The need to keep up with the neighbours, is often the primary factor in determining the individual's pattern of consumption, and, therefore, that which sets the pace and morality of the economic activity which comes to pay for that consumption. This, together with the status, power and satisfaction that come from having and earning more than others, can prevent people from distinguishing between what is moral and immoral, permitted or forbidden.

Even a casual glance at our surroundings will show that irrespective of their wealth, people suffer from an inability to know when they have enough. People do not decide to defraud, embezzle, or exploit others on the spur of the moment. These actions are essentially the result of social pressures, accepted norms of behaviour and the need to always have more of "mine."

It is only by educating people to restrain material appetites, by voluntarily limiting the standards of living, and by teaching the difference between real needs and imaginary wants, that it is possible to achieve a moral economic society.

Looking back at 5760: peace process dominant

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The two events that dominated the news in Israel during 5760 divided the nation, yet also brought it together: the peace process and the withdrawal from Lebanon.

Even though it faltered just before the finish line and its outcome is still uncertain, 5760 was a groundbreaking year on the peace front. In drawing as close together as they did, under the indefatigable prodding of U.S. President Bill Clinton at Camp David in July, the leaders of Israel and the Palestinians made concessions that only a few short years ago would have been considered unthinkable – indeed, tantamount to treason.

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat agreed to Israel's annexation of territory close to the pre-1967 borders, home to dozens of Jewish settlements and 150,000 Israelis. He agreed to have the ring of suburbs built by Israel around Jerusalem since 1967 be recognized, by the Palestinians and by the world community, as an integral part of Jewish Jerusalem and capital of the Jewish state.

He agreed, too, to a formula on the vexing issue of Palestinian refugees that would mean, in practical terms, the return to sovereign Israel of only a few thousand under family reunion schemes.

The international community would contribute massively to a resettlement and compensation program for millions of refugees now living throughout the Middle East. Had the two sides managed to resolve their differences over Jerusalem, there would have been agreement on a declaration ending their 100-year-old conflict.

Arafat also agreed to postpone a declaration of statehood until at least Nov. 15.

These are huge concessions from the Palestinian perspective. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak went even farther, as Clinton himself said.

Apart from his readiness to recognize Palestinian sovereignty – subject to a strict regime of security limitations – across more than 90 percent of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Barak was prepared to cede some Palestinian suburbs of Jerusalem, and to transfer to Palestinian rule some 50 Israeli settlements.

However, Arafat wanted even more on Jerusalem, especially in the Old City and on the Temple Mount.

At this writing, ministers and diplomats from the two sides are engaged in intensive efforts, through various direct and indirect channels, to find compromises to bridge the gaps over Jerusalem, or else to draft language that can leave Jerusalem unresolved, yet nevertheless proclaim the conflict at an end.

They are variously assisted, spurred, cajoled and pressured by government representatives, not only from the United States and Europe, but from Russia, China, the Third World and the Muslim world. Arafat is taking the brunt of the heat, because there is widespread recognition that Barak went as far as any Israeli political leader can afford to go – and perhaps farther.

But whether these efforts succeed or not, the historical record will not – cannot – be expunged.

The concessions offered, even though they were offered tentatively and conditionally, have become facts of political life.

Even if the two leaders' respective oppositions rail against them and threaten to vitiate them, each opposition will oppose the vitiation of the other side's concessions.

The partition of the Greater Land of Israel, or, more accurately, its repartition, began in Oslo in 1993 – or some would say in Madrid in 1991, or, as others insist, at Camp David in 1978 – and in the year 5760, became an irrevocable reality. It waits now only for its formal implementation.

Some in Israel see this as a cause for dismay. They feel Barak went too far and surrendered the Jewish people's historic claim to exclusivity in the Holy City. Jerusalem, after all, was the City of David more than a millennium before Islam was founded.

But few delude themselves that Barak's concessions, having been articulated in an international forum, can ever be rescinded. The "consensus" among Israelis, which for more than three decades was predicated on the permanent and sole sovereignty of the Jewish state over all of what is now municipal Jerusalem, will have to make way for another, more complex and less rigid consensus.

In the meantime, 5760 was relatively quiet on the terrorism front. A triple bombing struck the northern coastal town of Netanya in November, lightly to moderately wounding dozens of people just one day before Israeli and Palestinian officials were to begin final-status negotiations. But this was a rare event in 5760, and security co-operation between Israel and the Palestinians in combating terrorism appeared to be increasing.

For many Israelis, 5760 will be remembered as the year when, at last, the Israel Defence Force disengaged from their long and hopeless embroilment in Lebanon. The end, when it came in May, came suddenly and without much dignity. It came, moreover, accompanied by much criticism from the political opposition and from within the ruling coalition.

But Barak, having come to power on an explicit commitment to end the two-decades-old Israeli presence across the border within a year, was determined to abide by his word.

While the image of Lebanese celebrating and throwing stones over the border in the weeks after the withdrawal did not please many Israelis, Barak has been vindicated so far.

The pullback was not without its complications. The approximately 2,500 members of the Israel-allied South Lebanon Army were caught unaware by Israel's sudden withdrawal, and many felt deserted and angry. Israel offered to take in these militia fighters and their families, and many of the Christian fighters took Israel up on its offer.

But the United Nations and the Lebanese army have deployed in the areas along the border vacated by the IDF, no soldiers were hurt during the withdrawal and no civilians have been hurt since.

In the final year of his life, Assad – as he had throughout the three decades that he ruled Syria – proved an elusive foe for Israel. Barak had vowed soon after he was elected in the spring of 1999 that he would reach peace with Syria in a year.

But, again despite Barak and Clinton's best efforts, Assad refused to reach a deal with Israel, apparently because of disputes over borders in the Golan Heights, which Israel captured from Syria in the 1967 Six Day War, and which would be returned as part of any peace deal.

There is hope that Assad's son and successor, Bashar – who lived in the west for a time and is known to be a champion of the Internet – will open up further to the Israelis. But these hopes have yet to be realized.

Also in 5760, the visit of Pope John Paul in March moved and thrilled millions around the world. The Pope's sensitive and imaginative comportment will have a lasting influence on Catholic theology and on Catholic-Jewish relations for a long time to come.

Another piece of history made this year was the election by the Knesset of Sephardi politician Moshe Katsav as Israel's eighth president in a surprise victory over former Prime Minister Shimon Peres. The victory was seen both as a coming of age for Sephardim in Israel and as a rebuke to Barak.

In May, Israel's High Court of Justice ruled that women can pray at the Western Wall while wearing prayer shawls, marking a victory in an 11-year effort by the group Women of the Wall.

But as later events proved, this ruling was far from the final word on this issue. In July, Israel's High Court of Justice agreed to reconsider the decision, which had prompted an outcry from haredi politicians, who immediately proposed legislation to circumvent the ruling.

Violence spreads

Eruptions in the Galilee

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The violence which has engulfed Israel and the territories since last Thursday is not expected to die out in the next few days according to Israel Defence Force assessments.

These assessments were made on the basis of calls by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to his paramilitary youth organization, the Tanzim, to carry on with the disturbances.

So far, the unrest has claimed more than 30 Palestinian lives and two Israeli Border Guards, while hundreds have been injured.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak had an emergency meeting with senior defence officials and ministers Shlomo Ben-Ami and Amnon Lipkin-Shahak at his home in Kochav Yair Sunday night to discuss the disturbances.

During the meeting Barak said that "our restraint is the best proof that we do not wish further confrontation." He added "no one doubts who is stronger or more capable of sustaining a fight."

On Sunday, the bloody incidents also spread to Israeli Arab towns and villages in the northern part of the country, and a young man from Umm al Fahm was killed during rioting while dozens of others were injured.

The demonstrations resulted in the blocking of main arteries in Wadi Ara, Wadi Milq, and the Acre-Safed highway. Stone throwing closed a main road in Jaffa.

The IDF laid direct blame for the bloody disturbances on Yasser Arafat. Senior sources at the general staff claimed that Arafat continues to fan the flames despite clear promises made to Barak and the U.S. administration over the weekend.

According to Israeli sources, Arafat met on Friday at his Ramallah office with leaders of the Tanzim, the Fatah's youth paramilitary group, which is headed by Marwan Barghuti and top officers from his security forces.

Those present were given to understand by Arafat that there was a need to continue the disturbances in a way which would result in a significant number of fatalities among both Israelis and Palestinians.

Remembered as a friend

By JANICE ARNOLD and RON CSILLAG

Pierre Elliott Trudeau, whose charisma, vitality and panache altered the Canadian landscape, was also remembered last week as a friend to Canada's Jewish community, although there were ups and downs in that relationship.

Trudeau was prime minister during some tumultuous times in the Middle East, through wars, terrorist campaigns and unvarnished vitriol directed at Israel at the United Nations.

He also represented, as a member of Parliament, Canada's most "Jewish" riding, Mount Royal, whose constituents he sometimes infuriated and sometimes pleased, but who always generally held their MP in high regard.

Yet he was never perceived as an especially strong supporter of Israel or of Jewish causes generally, despite the fact that his riding was fully 38 percent Jewish.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Dena Wosk Dies

VANCOUVER — Dena Wosk, a longtime leader in this city's Jewish community and the matriarch of one of British Columbia's most prominent families, died Sept. 5. She was 84. Wosk had been involved in a myriad of Jewish organizations, including Hadassah-WIZO, Boys' Town and Shaare Zedek Hospital. Beit Wosk, a community centre in Ashkelon, provides a synagogue, seniors' centre and music programming.

Legal Aid Granted

ST. CATHARINES — Alleged Nazi collaborator Jacob Fast, 90, has been granted legal aid assistance. Lawyer Michael Davies will represent Fast in a hearing to determine whether he entered Canada fraudulently by withholding information about his wartime activities. Ottawa claims Fast, an ethnic German born in Ukraine, served as an auxiliary member of the German security police and was personally responsible for the arrest and mistreatment of prisoners, some of whom were later deported to concentration camps.

ISRAEL

Israel's Population

JERUSALEM — On the eve of Rosh Hashanah, Israel's population stands at 6.3 million, of whom 82 percent (5.15 million) are Jews and others, and 18 percent (1.15 million) are Arabs. In the past year, the population grew by 165,000, or 2.5 percent, slightly lower than in the previous year. Over 73,000 immigrants arrived during the past year, as opposed to 63,000 the previous year. Almost 90 percent came from the former Soviet Union, with 36 percent coming from the Russian Federation alone.

War Criminal Dies

JERUSALEM — In the wake of the news of the death of Aleskandras Lileikis, Efraim Zuroff, Israel director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, angrily criticized Lithuanian authorities for their "lack of political will" in bringing Lileikis to trial after his arrival in the country in 1996. Lileikis led a 100-member police unit that turned over Jews to Lithuanian murder squads at Ponar where 70,000 were killed. Lileikis, the wartime head of the security police in the Vilnius District, died in Lithuania without facing trial.

Enviro-Cops

JERUSALEM — Israel is creating a special police team to enforce environmental legislation. The new force will include at least 100 officers who will fine and arrest polluters.

Redress for Massacre?

JERUSALEM — Israel is seeking compensation from Germany for the relatives of the 11 Israeli athletes killed in the 1972 Munich Olympics massacre. A meeting earlier this month between Israeli and German officials came after the release of a documentary criticizing German security during the Games and their reaction to the kidnapping of the athletes by Palestinian gunmen.

WORLD

Klarsfeld Honoured

PARIS — France honoured a Nazi hunter with the nation's highest award. Serge Klarsfeld, whose books were among the first to recount France's role in the deportation of Jews during World War II, was named an officer of the Legion of Honour. Klarsfeld is "a man who is deeply committed to justice, a tireless human rights advocate," President Jacques Chirac said at a ceremony last week.

Youth Rampage

MOSCOW — Police in the central Russian town of Ryazan are probing a youth rampage through a Jewish school. The town's Jewish leaders say 15 youths armed with chains broke furniture, smashed windows and destroyed children's drawings.

Compensation Fund

BRUSSELS — Belgium will set up a fund to compensate victims for stolen Holocaust-era assets, dormant accounts and unpaid insurance policies. The government, Belgian banks and insurance firms will contribute to the fund.

Czech-Jewish Culture

PRAGUE — A 130-year-old restored synagogue in the Czech town of Breclav is to host an exhibit on the history of its Jewish community, including documents showing Jews were present in the town as early as 1414. As well, a Jewish club offering lectures on Jewish culture and courses in modern Hebrew has opened in the Czech spa town of Karlovy Vary.

Rabbis Support Courts on Twins Ruling

LONDON — British rabbis are supporting a court decision ordering the separation of conjoined twins, though the operation will mean the death of the weaker girl.

In a case that has sharply divided the nation, Britain's Court of Appeals upheld an earlier decision to separate the twins, who share vital organs.

The parents of the twins known as "Jodie" and "Mary" are opposed to the operation, although doctors believe that if the girls are not separated, both will die within months.

If they are separated, doctors say, Jodie could live a normal life, while Mary would die.

British Jewish ethicists are siding with the court order.

If someone is pursuing another person with the intent to kill, "you can kill the pursuer to save the life of the pursued," said a spokesperson for the Conservative movement.

Berel Berkovits of the Federation of Synagogues, an Orthodox body, said there are two ways to look at the case: "You might argue that it's one organism, in which case separating is like an amputation to save a life."

If the twins are two separate organisms, he said, each could be considered a pursuer of the other. "So the inevitable conclusion, sad though it is, is that you may – and in fact probably should – operate."

European Judaica collection finds a new home

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Forty-eight years after Dr. Fred Weinberg and his wife, Joy, started their Judaica collection, they have donated the bulk of it to the Royal Ontario Museum.

With it, the ROM has acquired its first permanent collection of European Judaica.

The Dr. Fred and Joy Cherry Weinberg Judaica Collection, which consists of some 100 objects celebrating Jewish life-cycle events, holidays and traditions, went on display on Sept. 23.

"This is a very important moment for the the ROM," said Corey Keeble, curator of ROM's department of Western Art and Culture.

"The Weinberg collection gives the ROM the first genuine opportunity to establish a permanent core collection of European Judaica," he added.

"While essentially European, it reflects the broader aspects of world Judaism, including the deep and abiding faith and social values of Eastern European Jewish immigrants arriving in Canada and the United States in the late 19th and early 20th centuries."

"Joy and I felt that the ROM was the perfect focus for the general public to become familiar with the Jewish life cycle and gain an understanding of the celebrations and rituals practised in the Jewish home," said Dr. Weinberg, who has written extensively on Judaica.

Dr. Weinberg said that he and his wife, well known in the fields of textiles, interior design and retailing, purchased their first pieces of Judaica – a silver Austrian Chanukah lamp and a set of French engravings portraying Jewish life – in 1952.

"We had an interest in antiques," he explained.

They have bought Judaica from dealers and at auctions, mainly in the United States and Israel.

Arranged according to significant events in the Jewish calendar, the collection ranges far and wide, from Torah scrolls and Torah finials to prayer book covers and charity boxes, including a rare Danish box in the art nouveau style.

In addition, the collection features the following artifacts:

- An 18th-century tankard with a print of the legendary British Jewish boxer, Daniel Mendoza.
- Two late 19th-century Torah breast plates from Germany
- An oversized Tree of Life New Year's card, circa 1925, probably designed in Poland and printed by the Hebrew

Yehuda Amichai

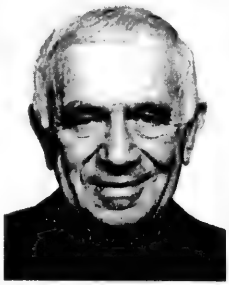
Let not the geographic distance that separates us from Jerusalem abate the hurt that came with the news of the death last week of Yehuda Amichai.

The death of a human being, any human being of course, is the death of an entire universe. But the death of Yehuda Amichai was the death of a vast, infinite Jewish universe of the 20th century that began in the death-grey ashes of Europe and ended in the life-blue sky of Israel; a universe that encompassed Germany, the British Mandate and the Jewish state reborn.

Amichai helped transform an entire people, even as the people were transforming a neglected land, and he so poignantly sang songs in a new-ancient language from the city that was his home, new-ancient Jerusalem.

In the last half-decade, a great deal has been written about and by the "post-Zionists" and the "new historians" in Israel who have been challenging, deriding and ultimately rewriting the narrations of Israel's founding and the purposes which made its founding an act of justice then and continue to make it just today.

Amichai's voice, in poetry, prose and drama was an elegant, eloquent but most important, a living testimony of the truth of those narrations and purposes



Yehuda Amichai

A few weeks ago, I called Amichai in Jerusalem to ask if he would contribute an essay for the Rosh Hashanah Supplement.

His wife, Hannah, answered the phone and conveyed the unhappy news that her husband was in the hospital, not well enough to undertake a writing assignment.

The tone of her voice filled in the spaces of what she left unsaid. I understood what she had imparted to me and thanked her and asked her to convey the paper's best wishes to her ill husband.

That night I pulled down from my bookshelf a collection of Amichai's poetry that was published by HarperCollins in 1994 to commemorate the author's 70th birthday. I wanted desperately to "hear" the author's voice again before it would be stilled forever.

I reproduce it here as a "memorial" to the man who will no longer write for us.

Our Palmach Batallion (7th) was taken out of the Negev where we had been for many months, cut off from the rest of the new country, together with a few heroic kibbutzim, like Negba holding the Negev against a vastly superior Egyptian army.

The enemy had tanks, artillery and war planes; we had only light weapons. So the remnants of our battalion were flown out to the north by W.W. 2 Dakota planes.

We were put in a camp not far from Tel Aviv and received fresh reinforcements whom we trained for the next large operation – the biggest of the War of Independence – the liberation of the south and the defeat of the Egyptian Army.

This was to start two days after Yom Kippur; thus we were ordered to march to the south into battle positions for the offensive. But first we got a few hours leave.

I went to see my parents who were staying with my sister in Tel Aviv.

I parked the jeep a few streets away from their synagogue. I went straight into the women's section.

My father was under the belief of what I had told him that it would take quite a few weeks till our batallion was ready for action.

My mother went home with me and she said: "I know for sure that the big offensive will start very soon. Don't lie to me."

My mother was very orthodox like my father. She even wore a sheitl.

When we arrived home she suddenly took out food and put it on the table. I was shocked. Although I had left orthodoxy in my mid-teens, it was, after all, still Yom Kippur.

She said: "Eat, eat. If God cannot prevent wars he has no right to make us fast."

I ate and went back to my battalion and two days later, the big offensive started.

The late former British poet laureate Ted Hughes once wrote of his friend Amichai's poetry: "One is no longer so aware of the virtuosity of a dazzlingly gifted poet, but of a telling of real things he has lived and felt, without any literary self-consciousness, and in a poetry that seems once more the natural speech of people who speak about the psychological depth and density of such things candidly, humorously, generously. This is something so rare that I, for one, return to the poems again and again, and always find myself shaken, as by something truly genuine and alive."

The truer power and fuller advantage of Amichai's poetry, of course, lies in its original Hebrew. Nevertheless it has been translated into some 37 languages, indisputable proof if any were needed, that non-Hebrew speaking readers around the world have also found meaning in his words.

May his memory be for blessing.

Schechter Institute head optimistic about Masorti

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Masorti, the Conservative movement in Israel, has faced serious issues over the past few years. To name a few, Masorti conversions and marriages performed in Israel are not recognized by the chief rabbinate, and the movement represents a minority in a society divided mainly between Orthodox and non-religious.

But Rabbi David Golinkin, Alice Shalvi's recent successor as president and rector at the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies (the Jerusalem affiliate of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary), rarely gets discouraged.

"By nature I'm an optimist," Rabbi Golinkin, a professor of Jewish law, said in an interview at the Lipa Green building last week. He was here to visit with family (his wife Chana is a former Torontonian), fund-raise for Schechter as part of a whirlwind North American tour, and lead one of the High Holy Day services offered at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

The 45-year-old scholar, a native of Arlington, Va. who has written or edited 17 books, comes across as a pragmatist, with statistics at his fingertips to back his positive attitude.

"Look," he said. "If the [graduate school at the] Schechter Institute went from five students to 420 students in 10 years and the [Masorti] TALI schools [and kindergartens] went from 16 to 104 schools in 10 years, it shows there are a lot of Israelis interested in Jewish education. I find that very encouraging."

He believes secular Israelis are not opposed to Judaism, but rather to a perceived lack of choice in Judaism. "Until the Conservative movement came along in Israel, you had to choose: Are you secular or are you religious? We're showing that you don't have to make that choice. There's a huge middle ground out there."

The Schechter Institute, established in 1984, runs a rabbinical school, a cantorial program, a master's program in Jewish studies; and Midreshet Yerushalayim, an outreach program for Russian immigrants that has branches in Israel, as well as a counterpart in eastern Europe.

Schechter is funded through donations from North America, an annual grant from the Jewish Agency and "a little bit" from the Israeli government.

"If we had a member of Knesset, we'd probably have access to more funding," said Rabbi Golinkin, adding that he personally does not want to be involved in "political games."

Rabbi David Golinkin

He is involved in working toward solutions for agunot – women whose husbands won't grant them a get – as director of the institute's Centre for Women in Jewish Law. He also serves as one of two Conservative representatives at the Institute for Jewish Studies, where representatives of all denominations prepare students from the former Soviet Union for conversion to Judaism.

The conversion institute, originally proposed by the Ne'eman committee in 1998, is "going strong" in its second year, Rabbi Golinkin said. By December, he noted, there will be 100 classes of about 20 students each. The effort is one example of the rabbi's work toward co-existence between the various streams of Judaism.

Another is a meeting he attended with haredi rabbis in the wake of an arson attack on Masorti synagogue Ya'ar Ramot in July, for which three newly Orthodox men (all known to the police) were arrested in August. Rabbi Golinkin said the meeting was "very positive."

He is also involved in a program called Amitei Emet, in which three Schechter rabbinical students study one day a month with three counterparts each from Hebrew Union College (the Reform seminary in Jerusalem) and a modern Orthodox yeshiva that Rabbi Golinkin declined to name; as well as three teachers from a secular kibbutz.

"The mission of the Schechter Institute," said Rabbi Golinkin, "is to teach open-minded pluralistic Judaism to the entire population of the State of Israel."

Because the institute's graduate program serves Israeli teachers and principals from secular, religious and TALI schools, the educators bring back to their respective schools what they learn at Schechter, Rabbi Golinkin explained.

"Many Israelis are brought up without any Jewish knowledge or experiences," he said. "Unfortunately, the image they have of Judaism is a negative image… What we're showing them is Judaism is a wonderful thing."

New Israel Fund founder issues a mixed report

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Twenty-one years ago, in the wake of Israel's historic peace treaty with Egypt, Jonathan Cohen and his wife, Eleanor Friedman, invited a group of friends, all Jewish social activists, to their home near San Francisco to discuss the current situation in the Middle East.

Jonathan Cohen

They were pleased with Israel's rapprochement with Egypt, but worried that it would foment brewing tensions in Israeli society that had been suppressed by Israeli's preoccupation with security and sheer survival.

At the same time, they were concerned by the drift toward hard-line nationalism, sectarianism and social and economic inequalities.

Wondering whether they could counter these worrisome trends, and animated by the Jewish tradition of tikkun olam (healing the world), Cohen and his spouse decided to form the New Israel Fund, whose mandate is to advance social justice and strengthen democracy in Israel.

Two decades on, the New Israel Fund – a classic grassroots activist movement – has played a meaningful role in both these broad areas.

Through the medium of grants to non-partisan, non-profit Israeli organizations, it has furthered the cause of civil and human rights and religious pluralism and tolerance in Israel.

In addition, it has worked to improve the status of women and Israeli Arabs.

Cohen, its co-founder and first executive director, is clearly pleased with its successes. "We've had a huge impact," he said in an interview during a visit to Toronto last week. "Without our programs, there would be higher levels of frustration and a sense of disempowerment and disenfranchisement, with a real potential for the rupturing of society."

In short, the New Israel Fund has given "a voice to the voiceless" and legitimized the very concept of citizen action.

"Thanks to the New Israel Fund, one can speak openly about Israel's shortcomings and injustices and still be recognized as strongly supportive," said Cohen, who describes himself as a passionately committed Zionist. "In other words, it's no longer necessary to idealize Israel in order to love it."

Cohen, however, is keenly disappointed that the negative trends he detected in 1979 have grown rather than dissipated.

Hard-line nationalism has developed into a more potent factor today. Sectarianism has deepened, with the result that Israelis share less of a common vision. The new wealth generated in Israel of late has widened the gap between haves and have-nots.

Cohen, a 53-year-old private investor who immigrated to the United States from South Africa in 1975, is particularly concerned by the growth of intolerance.

"It's the most disturbing trend," he said, citing the difficulty Israelis have in engaging in courteous civil dialogue.

This lack of tolerance, he believes, stems from several factors.

The vast majority of Israelis, hailing from the Arab world and the former Soviet Union, were born in countries without real democratic traditions.

Having lived under siege so long, Israel is still accustomed to making life-and-death decisions about its future, a state of mind which engenders acrimonious debate.

Many Israelis sincerely think that God is on their side.

"And we're a stiff-necked people," he observed.

Cohen, who grew up in Johannesburg and whose Lithuanian great-grandfather was one of South Africa's first rabbis, said that Zionism has triumphed in that Israel is now a flourishing and powerful nation.

And yet, he added, Israel is dogged by increasing tension between religious and secular Jews and torn by ethnic and racial divisions.

Religious Jews have become more vociferous in their demands on secular Jews. This, in turn, has spawned resentment on the part of non-religious Jews.

Meanwhile, Israeli Arabs, comprising almost a fifth of the total population, have become increasingly disaffected and radicalized. Among their grievances is the yawning gap in government funding between Arab and Jewish municipalities.

Cohen is delighted by Prime Minister Ehud Barak's declared intention to roll back the influence of religion on daily life in Israel. Recently, for example, Barak promised to introduce civil marriage and a constitution.

"Many of his proposals are in line with the New Israel Fund's agenda," he noted.

In the past two decades, the New Israel Fund has grown in terms of membership and level of philanthropy.

In 1979, with some 30 members, the New Israel Fund gave away about $80,000. Last year, with 20,000 members in North America, Europe and Israel, it raised just under $24 million.

Canada, he said, has approximately 1,000 active members. "Given the size of Canada's Jewish community, we hope for a significant increase in our Canadian membership."

Rabbi Sobel 'comes home' as new CCRJ director

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As the new executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), Rabbi Sharon Sobel feels like she has come home.

"Jewish life is thriving here and people are proud to be part of the community," said Rabbi Sobel, who served as assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple for six years before spending five years at a congregation in Stamford, Conn.

Toronto Jews typically look to Jewish institutions to provide them with their learning and spiritual needs, she says. "I missed this while I was in the United States. Judaism here is a priority for many more people. There is a different mentality.

"I have also had a wonderful relationship with rabbis and congregants in Toronto, and I look forward to strengthening that relationship."

The CCRJ, the Canadian arm of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) – the umbrella group for Reform Judaism in North America – serves its member organizations and their 10,000 constituent families by assisting with their outreach, spiritual, programming, educational and leadership development needs, and in lobbying for social justice.

Rabbi Sobel, 40, succeeds Rabbi Paul Golomb, who is now at Vassar Temple in Poughkeepsie, NY. A graduate of Boston University, she was ordained from Hebrew Union College (HUC) in 1987.

While in Connecticut, she initiated her temple's participation in a pilot education program co-sponsored by HUC and UAHC. "The experimental project used education to try and transform the congregation, and it had an amazing affect.

"It helped me to see that if it could have such an affect on one congregation, how could it improve the Reform movement from a broader perspective?"

One of the biggest issues in Reform Judaism, says Rabbi Sobel, is seeking ways to make congregations "more participatory, more meaningful, more sustaining. We want people to come and feel that they are not merely passive observers.

"People are hungry for a spiritual experience that they can find meaningful. They want to find that in a congregation, but it does not always happen. We want to help it happen."

She also wants to inspire young people to stay involved with learning. "Kids and families are involved in many other things. We need to find ways to make them see that we can enhance their lives," she says.

"Camp George [the Reform summer camp in Canada] offers studies and prayers, and the kids return all revved up. They come back to their congregations and provide a missing link."

Rabbi Sobel is looking forward to working closely with congregations across the country, she says, and plans on visiting each one at least once a year. "There are small communities where living a Jewish life is a challenge, yet it is important for them to do so. We have to support them by offering educational programs, consultations and synagogue training.

"We have to show them that they are part of the larger Reform community; we want them to stay connected and not feel isolated."

Canada is the smallest UAHC region in terms of the number of congregations, but it has the largest geography, she says. "How can we make all the communities feel connected? How do we engender a sense of community, and make each community feel that it has something to offer?"

She is also concerned about cutbacks in social services, "and what that means for faith-based institutions, who may be expected to pick up the slack."

Rabbi Sobel plans on spending her first year as executive director "listening to congregations, listening to rabbis, and listening to lay people, in order to learn what they would like to see happen," she says.

"Then I will address the immediate priorities."

Zhirinovsky not coming to town

TORONTO — Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky has postponed his visit to Canada "indefinitely," organizers said last week.

The flamboyant, often extremist politician, known for espousing anti-Semitic and pro-white views, was scheduled to visit Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto Oct. 2 through 6.

There had been reports – widely refuted – that Zhirinovsky would meet with a prominent Toronto rabbi and even attend a fund-raiser for the Jewish Russian Community Centre.

Canadian Jewish Congress had requested he be barred from Canada, or at least advised of this country's anti-hate laws.

But Zhirinovsky has been "detained in other matters," said Svetlana Galkin, spokesperson for Russian Canadian Broadcasting, which was to have sponsored his visit. She did not say when, if ever, Zhirinovsky would come to Canada.

CJC spokesman Manuel Prutschi said he was pleased at the latest development, saying Zhirinovsky is "not welcome in Canada."

As the High Holy Day period approaches, we are encouraged to reflect on our actions during the last 12 months and make a concerted effort to improve ourselves. This sense of renewal and optimism does not, of course, spring from a belief that the past can be wiped clean with a simple resolution to do better. Indeed, it is incumbent upon each of us to do what we can to resolve disputes with family, friends, neighbours and members of the larger community. This is only proper: how can we expect Hashem to accept our petitions if we turn a deaf ear to those that are offered to us - or fail to proffer our own as required?

Sadly, there are some disputes that cannot be resolved in such personal, heartfelt, ways. There are some situations where anger clouds our better judgement and reconciliation seems impossible. It is to deal with such cases that Jewish Mediation Services of Ontario (JMSO) was created. Operating under the auspices of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, JMSO is a non-profit, confidential mediation program mandated to facilitate the resolution of disputes and conflicts within the Jewish community.

While we hope that no member of our community should find himself or herself in difficult circumstances, we ask that you consider JMSO as a resource that can be employed whenever it is felt that a neutral third party can provide valuable guidance towards achieving a solution that is acceptable to both parties.

May we all be sealed for a year of health, happiness and prosperity.

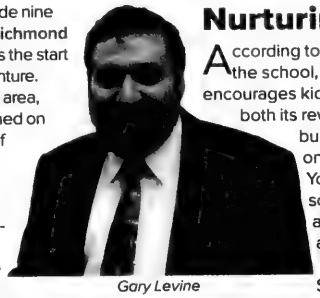
Second campus is first class

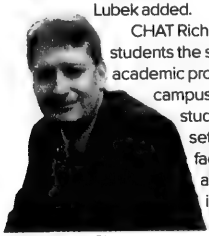
For the staff and 180 spirited grade nine students who now call CHAT Richmond Hill "home," the new school year is the start of an innovative educational adventure.

Located in the scenic Mill Pond area, CHAT Richmond Hill officially opened on September 5th. As CHAT Board of Directors President Baila Lubek explained, "the birth of a second CHAT campus is the result of tremendous growth in the community and unprecedented demand for quality Jewish education at the high school level. It's a pioneering opportunity for students and staff alike – a rare chance to be partners in building a new academic community."



Gary Levine

"Opening Richmond Hill enables CHAT to provide a parallel program to all our youth, and accommodate the increasing demand for a CHAT education. We've got room to grow, having reached capacity at our Wilmington campus," Lubek added.



Paull Simmons

CHAT Richmond Hill offers its grade nine students the same strength and scope of academic programming as the Wilmington campus, but with a single-grade student body in a more intimate setting. While both those factors will change with the years ahead, there are obvious immediate benefits. Guidance counsellor Carla Pearson noted that "almost every teacher knows at least half the students. That makes a big difference in what we can offer them and how well we can keep on top of their needs."

"There are many exciting opportunities for programming with Wilmington students," said Paull Simmons, Director of Student Services. "In addition to matches between our sporting teams and social activities like dances, where students will have a chance to mingle, our stage facility will be used to stage events for both campuses. As we develop our potential, we will have a lot to share as part of the CHAT family."

The diverse student population includes a number of New Stream kids -- students with no previous Jewish day school background. That cross section has turned out to be a big asset in building school spirit.

Jessica Parker, a New Stream student, stressed that her integration is an example of her new school tearing down old barriers. "We're all getting to know each other on a level playing field," she said. "No matter where we came from, we can break out of boundaries and define ourselves together as CHAT Richmond Hill."

Nurturing new leadership

According to Vice Principal Gary Levine, who heads the school, the CHAT culture of mutual respect encourages kids to take on responsibility and bear both its rewards and consequences. "That, too, builds leadership. CHAT kids learn early on that there are lessons all around them." You'd think the demands of setting up a new school campus might slow down students and staff. Not at CHAT Richmond Hill where activity is a mile-a-minute.

Paull Simmons, Director of Student Services, explained that "one of the most exciting aspects of the new Richmond Hill facility is how it enables a special group of grade nines to access and develop leadership skills through extra-curricular activities." Talking with the students, that excitement is palpable.

Jonathan Goldberg successfully ran for Student Council President, an experience only available to grade 12 students at the Wilmington Campus. "Our school is filled with new people, new challenges and new leadership opportunities for students. The message is 'if you want to start something, go for it.'"

A partnership of parents, teachers and students

Anyone who's played team sports knows the importance of everyone pulling together. Which is why CHAT Richmond Hill is committed to fostering an educational partnership between parents, teachers and students.

Several hard-working parent committees have helped shape the school year so far -- the Communications Committee, the Transportation Committee and the Extra-Curricular Activities Committee, which was also active in planning the school opening. "After curriculum night," Vice Principal Gary Levine said, "parents called to thank us for the quality of the teaching staff. I'd like to return the compliment and thank our parents for their ongoing commitment and support."

Within these walls

Features of the school include a large sports playing field, a specialized music room and studio, a working stage with lighting tracks, a drama room, fully-equipped science labs, and a computer lab with 25 new computers. The large gym has an observation gallery and there is a spacious art room.

Of course, the physical amenities tell only part of the story. "What's so extraordinary here is how students are encouraged to do things," student Laura Hartman said. "If there are students willing to organize a club or event, it happens. We're shaping our high school and our high school years."

A hand-selected, home-grown staff

The 18-member teaching staff includes a mix of veterans and new teachers -- with five CHAT alumni. "We are proud to continue this CHAT tradition of having former students return to the school family as teaching professionals," noted Vice Principal Gary Levine.

As past CHAT graduates, Talya Braude, Adina Herman, Daniella Robicsek, Lainie Sugar and Anna Freudenstein Urowitz bring a special understanding of CHAT culture to their students. "The best part of being back at the school as a professional," Talya said, "is the chance to really pioneer the program in Richmond Hill with an enthusiastic new generation."

CHAT -- The Child of Vision

CHAT is the child of vision, the vision of a few men and women who had the commitment and insight to build a school for the entire Jewish community just over 40 years ago.

"None of this would be possible today without the support of the community," CHAT Headmaster Paul Shaviv said. "A community school can only exist with the foresight, commitment and funding generosity of that community, and in our case UJA FEDERATION. The level of support is as unique as CHAT itself." The CHAT connection to the community is best exemplified by the school's past, present and future partnership with Jewish Toronto Tomorrow – a UJA FEDERATION initiative. It resulted in the expansion of the Wilmington campus, started in 1999, and designated as the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre; the present initiative in Richmond Hill; and developing plans for CHAT's future presence on the UJA FEDERATION York Region Community Campus.

Pierre Elliott Trudeau

The man evoked strong emotions. That is because the man displayed strong emotions. This was one of the great ironies of his nearly two decades in Canadian public life. For, more than most men, he championed reason, logic and intellect over emotions. And yet it was the torrent of highly charged emotions, friendly and unfriendly, unleashed across the country by the mere mention of his name that ultimately became one of the chief markers of his tenure as prime minister of Canada.

Pierre Trudeau died last week after bravely struggling with the two diseases that ultimately subdued his body, his spirit having been perhaps mortally wounded two years earlier by the tragic death of his youngest child. He would have turned 81 years old this month.

The younger generation of Canadians, born at the beginning of the '80s, hardly knows Pierre Elliott Trudeau, if at all. Yet they are the inheritors of a country whose constitutional ethos he totally transformed, whose jurisprudential system now carries within it a legally enshrined respect for and protection of the dignity and human rights of the individual.

And this, too, was another one of the great ironies of Pierre Trudeau's nearly two decades in Canadian public life. He believed resolutely and deeply in the desirability of a strong, centralized federal government. Yet, however broadly encompassing he envisioned the powers of the federal government should be, they were never intended to be so broad or so encompassing as to encroach upon the fundamental freedoms and basic rights of the individual.

Pierre Trudeau was the quintessential post-World War II, post-Expo 67 "new Canadian," a man rooted in his region but whose personal sweep extended far beyond, like a wide canopy that arched from one coast to the other. That canopy he called his "just society," a society he hoped in his heart would be one of equal opportunity, justice and fairness for all Canadians. Government, he believed, was obliged to try to elevate human existence in ways that led the governed closer – even by a little bit – to the possibility of greater individual fulfillment and societal improvement.

Trudeau's own words, as recorded by Ron Graham, will conclude these remarks: "Justice to me is a warm spirit, born of tolerance and wisdom, present everywhere, ready to serve the highest purposes of rational man. To seek to create the just society must be amongst the highest of those human purposes. Because we are mortal and imperfect, it is a task we will never finish; no government or society ever will. But from our honest and ceaseless efforts, we will draw strength and inspiration, we will discover new and better values, we will achieve an unprecedented level of human consciousness. On the never-ending road to perfect justice we will, in other words, succeed in creating the most human and compassionate society possible."

May it be God's will and our determination that each day we move ever closer to creating the truly just society.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Cotler responds to Simcoe

Your columnist G.K. Simcoe is correct in stating ("Scene in Ottawa," CJN, Sept. 7) that "it is safe to assume that for Cotler, Jerusalem is the capital of Israel and should never be redivided," but it appears that he or she was misinformed – and inadvertently misleading – in wondering why I would not meet with Justice Minister Yossi Beilin in his East Jerusalem office.

Your readers are entitled to know the facts, as follows:

- I have met with Beilin – in my capacity as an MP – in his office in East Jerusalem.
- During my recent visit to Israel – and again in my capacity as an MP – I also met in East Jerusalem with Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein. There has been no change in my conduct on these matters since before and after my election as an MP.
- I did not refuse to meet with Beilin during my recent visit in Israel, nor did I meet him elsewhere. In fact, we did not speak at all while I was in Israel.
- What did occur was that the Canadian Embassy contacted Beilin to arrange a meeting for me on the International Criminal Court in a representative capacity on behalf of Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy. The night before the meeting, I was advised by Michael Bell, the Canadian ambassador to Israel, that the meeting was scheduled to take place in Yossi Beilin's office in East Jerusalem. My reply was, "I have no problem with that personally or as a matter of policy; I've been there before."

However, as Bell advised me, what I did in my capacity as an MP was one thing, but what I did in a "representative capacity" was another. In this instance, as Bell put it, I was "representing the executive power of government." Also, I was advised by Bell – whose office had arranged the meeting – that he could not accompany me to the meeting, in accordance with government policy.

It was, in my view, inappropriate if not unethical to attend a meeting in a representative capacity, when the person whom I was representing – Lloyd Axworthy – would not himself have done so, and his designated emissary in Israel – who had arranged the meeting – would not be able to participate. There is a difference between what I am prepared to do as an elected official and in accordance with my principles, even if it does not comport with government policy, and what I, or anyone, can do when asked to act in a representative capacity on behalf of another.

For some, only nine commandments?

As a member of the Montreal Jewish community, I abhor and distance myself from the tax fraud scheme orchestrated by some of the members of the Tash community in Boisbriand. We will do ourselves a great disservice by trying to sweep this matter under the rug. It has brought us disgrace and must be dealt with squarely and quickly.

Obviously the commandment, "Thou shall not steal," is somehow missing from their doctrine. Their overzealous pursuit of funds to advance their cause overshadows their commitment to Torah.

Equally at fault are the "dozens if not hundreds" of Jews and Jewish businesses reported to have willingly become a party to the scam. To them I say, your greed surpasses your good judgment.

Says Day's promise appropriate

Stockwell Day's pledge to provide tax credits for non-funded denominational schools is an appropriate response to the UN ruling that said funding denominational schools only for Catholics is discriminatory and violates international law. If Ontario won't fix its discrimination, Canada has an obligation in international law to use the powers available to it to provide a remedy. Day is only promising to do what the federal Liberal government already has an obligation to do.

One-issue myopia

Re: In Support of Stockwell Day (CJN, Sept. 7), I am chagrined and deeply troubled. On the basis of the lessons I learned from my Holocaust experience that "bad things happen when good people keep quiet," I must raise my voice when some Jewish voices, especially young voices, team up with the most neo-Conservatives, and help them to become mainstream and even attractive, in this, so far, liberal country.

Whether or not the leader himself uttered anti-Semitic remarks is relatively unimportant. What is important is the overall social policies a leader's party would likely bring about.

Segments of the Jewish community mustn't be so myopic as to back a party on one issue alone, namely that of the financing of private Jewish schools. It would be nothing short of a tragedy of unlearned lessons.

In the long run, and in the broader societal sense, nothing gives minority groups greater security than the scrupulous defence and maintenance of liberal-social democracy.

Perspectives

Reb Moshe and the lost Kol Nidrei

By CURT LEVIANT

Many medieval Yiddish folk-tales begin with "This is a true story" – a sure signal that it's make-believe.

But this is a true story.

In mid-January, 1981, I entered a bookstore in central Jerusalem, just off Yaffa Road, and overheard a short, elderly, white-bearded man asking for a book. He wore a beaten black fedora, a suit that was more black than blue, a thick overcoat, a dark green wool scarf and gloves. He spoke a Russian-accented fluent Hebrew.

Since my family stemmed from Russia, I asked him which city he came from. Gomel, he said. Excited, I told him I had relatives who had lived there. Listening to his meticulous Hebrew, I asked him how long he had lived in Israel.

"One year."

"Where did you learn Hebrew? In an ulpan?"

He looked at me over his wire-rimmed glasses. "No. From my siddur." (In Hebrew, it came out mellifluously: "Mi-siddur tefillati.")

Growing up before World War I, he had obviously studied in cheder and knew the entirety of the Jewish tradition. Yet, his precise knowledge of grammar and punctuation had come from a study of his little prayer-book.

We exchanged a few more words and I watched him leave the bookstore with the agility of a man half his age. He held his newly purchased book under his arm, close to his heart, like a Jew carries a Torah.

After he left, a wave of regret came over me. Why didn't I ask him who he was, where he lived? I should have gotten his phone number – if he had one. It is rare that one gets a sense of immediate endearment for another person, and I felt it with him. He had a radiance; it emanated from his warm, gentle and wise face.

Why did I let him go? I berated myself. Here was a man who reminded me of the lovable old men of Jerusalem who appear in Agnon's stories. He seemed to have stepped out of the pages of Agnon.

But destiny has its own rules.

His name was Moshe Ashbel, and over the next few weeks, when he was a frequent guest in my house, he gradually revealed his story. Now he lived in Gilo, a southern suburb high up in the hills outside Jerusalem, which in summer was an air-conditioned neighbourhood.

Agnon once wrote that the Land of Israel has all the climates of the world and that Jerusalem has all the climates of Israel. In the Eyn Karem section of Jerusalem it was warm in winter and hot in summer; in Gilo, it was cool and cold, pleasant and breeze-brushed in summer.

Reb Moshe was an observant Jew, a Lubavitch Chassid, but like the Rebbe (and unlike most other Chabadniks), he was university educated. Moshe Ashbel had secular interests: Hebrew and world literature, science, grammar, math and especially music. Ever since earning his degree he had taught math in a high school in Gomel.

Moshe Ashbel was now in his mid-70s. He loved chazzanut, something he'd been deprived of in the Soviet Union for most of his life. (Of what else he was deprived we'll soon come to.) He told me that every Shabbat and yom-tov morning he would walk down from Gilo – about 45 minutes downhill and one hour up – to come hear Cantor Hershtik and the choir at the Great Synagogue. He was proud of his collection of cantorial music, especially the Kol Nidrei.

In May 1948, when the State of Israel was founded, he was a married man in his early 40s with two sons. Hearing the news in school on that momentous day, Moshe Ashbel did not restrain his joy.

A fellow teacher came up to him. "Ah, so you're glad about Israel, huh?"

"Yes, I am," Reb Moshe replied. (After all, the Soviet Union had just officially recognized the nascent Jewish state.)

"Would you like to go there?" And in the telling, Reb Moshe imitates the teacher's sarcasm.

"Yes, even on foot."

Within the next few days, he was arrested and sent to a labour camp in Siberia. In the camp, he said, he somehow found favour with the guards. Prisoners would be given a small ration of cigarettes every month, but since he did not smoke, he gave them to a guard who, in appreciation, let him write letters home. He even provided him with pen and paper, which according to gulag rules was forbidden.

The cold of Siberia chilled his bones in perpetuity. He could never get warm. Summer was his favourite season – but even then he wore a light overcoat.

In 1953, when Stalin died, Reb Moshe was freed, having served five years of a 10-year prison sentence.

He resumed teaching. His wife died; his sons, trained as engineers, moved to different parts of Russia for their jobs. He had an aged mother, whom he supported.

When the doors to emigration slowly opened, Moshe Ashbel acted on his desire of 30 years earlier to move to Israel. Now that he was already in his 70s and a pensioner, he applied to leave and was given permission. (By his departure, the regime would save paying him his monthly pension.) While his mother was alive, he could not, did not, think of leaving. But once his mother had died, he felt he was free to go.

Finally, the blessed day arrived. His suitcases contained only two items of value: his grandfather's little siddur and the score to a piano and violin version of the Kol Nidrei by the Russian violin virtuoso and composer, Mikhail Erdenko.

Reb Moshe told me that Erdenko had visited Tolstoy in 1910, the year of the great author's death. Tolstoy remarked that the Jews have a beautiful melody for one of their Yom Kippur prayers, the Kol Nidrei. He urged Erdenko to arrange that melody for piano and violin. Erdenko acceded and the music was published in Russia.

"When I got to the airport," Moshe Ashbel said, "the customs inspector looked over every item in my luggage and removed two things: my siddur and Erdenko's Kol Nidrei. As soon as they did this I sat down on the floor. I thought to myself: the Kol Nidrei is not unique. I can always get another copy.

"But not my grandfather's siddur, which I've had all my life, even in Siberia. It was the only thing I had from him. So I told them, 'I'm not leaving until you give that book to me.'

The customs agent said, 'Go board the plane.'

"Then I said, 'I'm not getting up. Call your supervisor.' To my surprise, he went and found a supervisor. This one wouldn't or couldn't help me either. I asked him to call his boss, the head of customs for the airport. Well, that man actually came, saw me sitting on the floor, paged through my siddur and threw it at me, saying with disdain, 'Let him take that thing and go.' I got up, boarded the plane and landed in Israel…

"Now I have a favour to ask you," Reb Moshe said to me.

"Up to half the kingdom," I said, quoting King Achashverosh's remark to Queen Esther.

"When you go back to America, please try to find the Erdenko score and send it to me."

I promised. And thus began my years' long search.

I went to libraries, called schools of music, spoke to violinists. None had ever heard of Erdenko. I wrote to Moshe Ashbel, informing him of my lack of success. Four years later, in 1985, when I was able to renew my friendship with him, I still had nothing for him.

More years passed. My beloved friend Reb Moshe lived to see his two sons arrive in Israel, and then, like the passing years, he too passed on.

But I still continued my search. I learned that Erdenko had concerted in the United States in the early 1930s and had even played in Carnegie Hall.

I called Bob Sherman of WQXR who had connections with Soviet musicians. He promised to look into the matter for me next time he visited Russia. But he came back empty handed. No one had heard of Erdenko.

I wrote to the three major music academies in the Soviet Union: Moscow, Kiev, Leningrad. Only Leningrad answered; they know nothing about him.

It was not until the fall of 1999 that I finally got some solid information about Mikhail Erdenko and the lost Kol Nidrei.

I had been invited by a New Jersey synagogue to give a talk about The Song of Songs, a book by Sholom Aleichem that I had translated. The co-ordinator was a retired professor of music who, hearing my story, suggested I contact the founder of the Borodin Quartet, a Russian Jew by the name of Rostislav Dubinsky.

Dubinsky had written a marvellous book, Stormy Applause (which I devoured at one sitting), which limned the fear, tension and degradation of being a first-rate musician and a Jew in the Stalin and post-Stalin era.

I called the publisher, Hill and Wang, and was informed that they did not have Mr. Dubinsky's current address, for the book was published some years back, but the clerk did remember that he lived in Bloomington, Indiana. That's all I needed. Bloomington meant the famous school of music at the University of Indiana.

I called and asked to speak to Mr. Dubinsky. The receptionist said she would ring the extension of his wife, Luba, who was a member of the Borodin Trio. (By this time it had become a trio.)

When she answered, I told her I wanted to speak to Mr. Dubinsky.

"I'm sorry to tell you that my husband passed away, and quite suddenly, two years ago. How can I help you?"

I told her the story – the same one I had repeated countless times. I wondered if she could help me. And, naturally, I told her I had read her husband's marvellous book.

"Of course I can," she said warmly. "My late husband would have been able to give you more information, but I can tell you that, like many other intellectuals in Russia, he has been made to disappear."

I told her how many years I've been searching for Erdenko.

"You won't find a trace of him. The Soviets erased him."

"Was he a Jew?"

"Of course Erdenko was a Jew. That's all the more reason that you won't find him or his Kol Nidrei."

Like all good things in this world that are lost and never found again.

But every Yom Kippur, when I hear the centuries-old melody, I think of my dear friend, Reb Moshe Ashbel, of blessed memory, and wonder what Erdenko's piano and violin version sounded like. And through waves that link us all, the quick and the dead, I tell Reb Moshe that my promise still holds: I haven't given up the search.

Anti-Semitism in Israel?

From time to time I dispose of or give away issues of magazines to which I subscribe. Before I do so, however, it is my habit to glance through them for the last time to see whether there was something that I had overlooked. That habit paid off in August, when I discovered an item that I had missed in the July 17 issue of the Jerusalem Report. The short article must surely be the strangest piece of Jewish information I had seen in a long time.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It says that Knesset member Naomi Blumenthal, who is the parliament's chair of the absorption committee, introduced a bill to outlaw anti-Semitism in Israel. The Jerusalem Report characterized the bill as "surrealistic" — an ascription which appears to be highly appropriate. Yet, that is precisely what took place.

The almost unbelievable fact is that anti-Semitism has made its appearance in Israel as it has done all over the world. The article by Karen Yourish suggests that this strange phenomenon stems from non-Jewish Russian immigrants who have been able to make aliyah under the pretence of being Jewish and have now turned against their Jewish fellow citizens.

Yourish quotes an observer who knows Russian overhearing the following remarks while shopping in a supermarket: "It's a pity Hitler didn't finish off all of you," and hearing three drunks shouting, "Beat the Zhids."

Many years ago when I was travelling in Israel, I heard a well-known journalist say, "I'm sure you have found out that this is a land in which everything can happen." Only now, reading of anti-Semitism in Israel, do I fully understand how right the journalist was.

Obviously, the occurrence of anti-Semitic remarks in the land of the Jews is very marginal and restricted to a tiny group of outsiders who feel alienated for whatever reasons. In some ways this is just another example that the vision of those who want Israel to be a land like all other lands is nearing realization.

Those of us who were Zionists in the original sense, and who have maintained that vision even during difficult days, have dreamt of an Israel that is in most respects unlike other nations because it would represent the essence of being Jewish at its best.

In some respects, the land has more than fulfilled this hope, but there are lacunae with which the present generation is struggling. For better or for worse (and the latter only rarely), the land is still that place in the world in which everything can happen.

Fortunately, it is for the better most of the time, and sometimes even for the best.

Jewish bond unites students

Friday night dinner at home has always been special for me. While growing up, it was a very important part of my week. When was there another opportunity to actually see other members of my family where no one was in a rush to get somewhere?

When I left for school, one of the things that I missed the most about being away from home was this end-of-the-week gathering.

Last week, a friend of mine and I decided that we wanted to see a bunch of our Jewish friends who are living in Halifax. Many of my friends here have come from homes with the same Friday night experience, and I felt that it might be something that they missed too.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

Although we would have preferred to have a conventional dinner at home, we agreed that it was unrealistic to have everyone over at either of our places. We decided that a restaurant would be the best bet.

We sent out a mass e-mail to a mixture of camp and various Jewish friends from our respective programs asking them if they would like to join us for dinner for the upcoming Friday. The response was very positive from everyone, and we were very excited to see so many of our friends at once, keeping in mind how busy school had kept us the past few weeks.

As Friday approached, I wondered if I had made a mistake combining so many different groups of people who really did not know each other.

What would they talk about? Some of these people were graduate students with years of study and travel under their belts, while others were first year university students, who had never been away from home.

I prefer to avoid awkward conversation and get really uncomfortable when people just do not mix. I really wanted everyone to blend in and have a great time.

I learned a very important lesson last week. Our backgrounds might have been somewhat different, but we had one thing in common – we were Jewish.

We all came from different programs at school with different backgrounds and different ages. Yet, we had the bond.

It was fascinating to me to observe the conversations that went on. People were just eating and talking and opening up as though they had been friends for ages because they felt that they had a distinctive connection between them.

I never experienced anything like this until living out of town. I am not saying that connections like this do not exist in Toronto, my birthplace, but last week illustrated to me how a smaller community may draw you in to a special aspect of Jewish life.

When you tend to "sense" more of your minority status, you appreciate meeting other people who share the same faith and you feel an immediate tie. Awareness of the notion of Jewish continuity is also enhanced because people work a little harder to maintain a Jewish identity for themselves and their families.

By the end of the night, we all decided that we wanted to repeat the dinner date. My parents taught me that for our family, Friday night at home was a sanctuary from the hectic buzz of the week. Now I would like to incorporate that into my life here.

Even though we did not have the traditional Shabbat dinner like the one that I have at home, a way has been found to adapt the concept to our lives as students and feel rewarded by the outcome of the night.

It is funny how I took Shabbat dinners for granted when I was living at home. It only goes to show how you never really know how much you will miss something until you can't easily have it.

An alternative way to pray

Holidays. A staple in the life of any Jewish family – going to dinners with the relatives, missing school, attending Synagogue.

For me, family dinners have and always will be a part of my life and this remains true for many of my friends. I still miss school for the High Holy Days, but it's less of a perk now and more of an inconvenience.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

And while I have always gone to synagogue and probably always will, for many people I know, attending synagogue has been phased out of their holiday experience.

At least from my point of view, it's quite interesting to see how things have changed in Winnipeg over the years.

I would always go to Herzlia Synagogue on Brock and Fleet and I thought that my friends would always attend their synagogues, whether it be at the Rosh Pina or Shaarey Zedek or any of the other shuls in Winnipeg.

As the years passed though, some of my friends and their parents stopped going to synagogue.

What was it? Why did people not want to go to synagogue anymore? I guessed that maybe religion just wasn't important to them, or maybe it was laziness. As I grew "older and wiser" and took notice of various things happening in the Jewish community, I realized that these reasons may be incorrect.

My thoughts first became clearer when I heard of the High Holy Day services provided by the Rosh Pina Synagogue, lead by Rabbi and Mrs. Rose.

This service, titled Family of Roses, takes a different approach to the traditional Rosh Hashanah ceremony. One of the main differences between this service and Rosh Pina's more traditional one, is that it is family run.

Rabbi Rose, his wife, and his sons all help in facilitating the service. So instead of a central figure leading the Holy Day, you have a few people guiding the activities.

While Torah reading is still a component of the "Rabbi Rose Service," the service also involves various stories, poems and songs that are meant to broaden the congregation's understanding of Holy Days and to make the synagogue experience more engaging and interactive.

Once I became aware of the Roses' family tradition, I began to take notice of the phrase "alternative services." Although many of my friends went to these "alternative services," I still couldn't imagine myself not sticking with the more traditional route of prayer.

However, another one of these unconventional approaches to the synagogue experience may have changed my mind.

Three years ago, one of my friends and her family made the Rosh Hashanah trek to our summer camp, Camp Massad. They decided to have a Rosh Hashanah service there, which included just a few families.

Like Rabbi Rose's service, this service includes songs, poems, stories and true to the Massad nature, a Rosh Hashanah related play. It is also very interactive and it includes Torah readings.

In its infancy, the Massad service, which is run by various family members, was only open to a few families. But last year, they opened the service to the community.

To everyone's surprise over 100 people attended. This year they actually advertised the service (last year it was just word of mouth), so Massad is expecting a very large crowd for their Rosh Hashanah festivities this year.

I spoke to Leah Braemer, who organizes the Massad service, about why she decided to pack up her family for the Holy Days and head to Winnipeg Beach, where Camp Massad is located.

She said that synagogue wasn't very meaningful for her, and she didn't have much of a connection with the prayers. Looking at the turnout to both of the alternative services in Winnipeg, it is evident that many people share her sentiments.

I now realize that it is not about being lazy or not wanting anything to do with Judaism, but it is that people just need to find something that suits them. Something that gives them that spiritual connection that they feel is missing.

Times are changing and people are changing. In an era of individualism and self-expression some people can't connect with the traditional ways of prayer anymore and maybe the alternative service is just the thing to bring them closer to whatever they are looking for.

Young woman takes aim at career as a cantor

As these words are written, Avitall Gerstetter is settling down for a two-year regimen of study in New York City. When she is finished, she will be Germany's first native-born, female cantor.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

"I really hope people will accept me," she said humbly. "It's what I want to give to the people. It comes from the heart. It's just the right thing to do. I have great respect for the synagogue and the bimah. I want to do something good for the community."

Soft-spoken, with a mane of curly, pale brunette hair, blue eyes, a flushed pink complexion, a curvaceous figure and a bubbly personality, Gerstetter looks and sounds more like a successful model or actress than an aspiring cantor.

Twenty-eight years old and single, her ambitions are fed by the Jewish community of Berlin, where she was born and raised. Thanks to its current president, Andreas Nahama, Gerstetter, a history professor in private life, is comfortably installed in New York City on a scholarship.

The fact that Berlin will have a cantor like Gerstetter speaks volumes about the community's growing openness and gradual receptivity to pluralism. "We're in the 21st century," she said, "and Jewishness has to change with the times."

Avitall Gerstetter

Nahama, nevertheless, is under no illusions as to what may await his protegé upon her return to Germany. "Avitall will not be accepted by all Jews," he conceded. "But she will find a place in the Oranienberger synagogue."

Apart from Nahama, Gerstetter owes her budding cantorial career to two other people: Nahama's late father, Estrongo, who, until his recent death, was for many years the cantor at the Pestalozzi synagogue; and Rebecca Garfein, an American cantor based in Berlin. Having heard her sweet, melodic voice, both Nahama and Garfein encouraged Gerstetter to become a cantor.

Although she is well on her way toward achieving this goal, she is still awed by the prospect. "I couldn't imagine being a cantor when it was first suggested to me. But I remember my singing teacher telling me my style was cantorial."

Gerstetter's parents, Chava and Reinhold, are pleased with her plans. "They are very happy about it. They think it suits me."

Chava, a music teacher at a Jewish school, is an Israeli who was born in Haifa. Reinhold, a graphic artist from Stuttgart, designed Germany's latest batch of bank notes as well as some of its postage stamps. He is a Protestant convert to Judaism.

Gerstetter and her older sister, Daniela, grew up Jewishly. She attended a Jewish kindergarten in Berlin and then a regular high school, where she was one of only three Jewish students in the class.

At 14, she was sent to Britain for a year to improve her English. In her last year in high school, she went to Nashville to acquire American English. Then she lived in Israel for several months, perfecting her knowledge of Hebrew.

Subsequently, she studied English and music in the hope of becoming a teacher. But after meeting the Nahamas and Garfein, she switched course. In 1998, she began singing at the Oranienberger synagogue, and in 1999 she took classes in cantorial singing and rabbinics in Pittsburgh.

Several months ago, she performed at Beth Sholom, a liberal congregation in Munich, and made her first cassette.

Animated by a strong sense of duty, Gerstetter feels she has a contribution to make in rebuilding a community shattered by the Nazis. And she is upbeat about her chances of success, the naysayers notwithstanding. As she put it: "I wouldn't do this job if I wasn't optimistic."

A reporter's notebook

Visiting Berlin in 1996 in his capacity as Israel's president, Ezer Weizman wondered out loud why Jews were still living in Germany. It was really a dated and irrelevant question, given the fact that Germany's Jewish community is the fastest growing one in the Diaspora, and that thousands of Israelis have settled in Germany.

Silence, of course, greeted Weizman's observation. Moishe Waks, vice-president of Berlin's community, was less diplomatic. "These are ideas of the 1950s and 1960s," he said in a recent interview. "It was an annoying statement. We have to realize that the president of a state can say stupid things. It was very astonishing."

In years past, Jews in Germany regularly left for greener pastures, including Wak's brother, Robbi, who made aliyah in 1969. But Charlotte Knobloch, president of Munich's community, is staying put. Two of her three children, however, live abroad. "For them, the world is bigger than Germany," she said. Salomon Korn, president of Frankfurt's community, knows the feeling. One brother, a stage director, is based in Paris but often works in Germany. Another brother, a doctor, lives in Israel.

***

Michael Wolffsohn, 53, is an unusual individual. He is the only Jewish professor at Munich's German Armed Forces University. Born and raised in Tel Aviv, he and his German-born parents settled in Germany in 1954. From 1967 to 1970, he served in the Israeli army as an administrator in the manpower department of the artillery corps. A prolific writer, he has written 23 books and 90 articles on Jewish, Israeli and German affairs. Proud to be described as a German Jew, a term most Jews in Germany eschew, Wolffsohn observed, "Empirical data shows a growing identification of Jews with Germany."

Rabbi Walter Rothschild, a graduate of Leo Baeck College in London, is something of a gadfly, having been roundly criticized by conservative elements in the Jewish community for being too liberal about conversions. "I come from a tradition which challenges the past," he explained, "and here I have the feeling that the past is more important than the future. My job is to safeguard the past and build the future."

Germany has fairly close ties with Iran. But Germany is none too pleased with several aspects of Iran's policy and behaviour, according to a German diplomat in charge of Iranian affairs at the foreign ministry in Berlin.

Iran's human rights record is abysmal. "The will of the people doesn't count as much as the will of the leaders in Iran," he said. During President Mohammed Khatami's visit to Berlin last July, Germany demanded a fair trial for the 13 Jews accused of espionage, and asked that they not be executed if found guilty.

The diplomat said that Germany is also concerned by Iran's determination to develop weapons of mass destruction. Yet he does not believe that Iran wants to threaten or destroy Israel. Iran's immediate concerns are Iraq and Afghanistan, not Israel. "Iran accepts Israel tacitly, but does not wish to have ties with Israel."

Israel's new embassy in Berlin, scheduled to have been completed in September, is still without an ambassador. Ehud Barak chose Yossi Katz, a One Israel member of Knesset, as Israel's envoy in Germany. But the appointment was overruled by the Civil Service Commission, and a replacement has not been designated. In the interim, David Walzer, who once served in Ottawa, is the acting ambassador.

***

Paul Spiegel, the current president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, is not as media-wise as his late predecessor, Ignatz Bubis. The reclusive Spiegel has given remarkably few interviews. I asked for a meeting and was granted one. But at the last moment, he pulled out for family reasons. Several days later, I was informed that he would be available in Berlin. When I called his assistant to set up an interview, he was unavailable yet again.

Last of a series on Germany.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In 1995, 18-year-old Stacey Levitt went out for a run near her home. She was fatally struck by a car just days before Rosh Hashanah.

"It was five years ago, but it feels like five minutes," Stacey's father, Ned Levitt, told a group of 40 at a recent meeting of Bereaved Jewish Families of Ontario.

"I never imagined that I would have to live without Stacey. Yet somehow, I have survived. I am still here five years later."

Levitt, who is on the steering committee of Bereaved Jewish Families, an organization under the umbrella of Jewish Family and Child Service, was one of three speakers to address the topic: My Child Has Died: Am I Reacting the Way I Should?

Levitt said he is constantly asking himself if he is reacting in the appropriate way. "Five years later, I can smile. [But] how can I enjoy my life when my Stacey does not have her life anymore?" he said.

Levitt said he has to constantly gauge the impact of his need to talk about his daughter on the people around him, and so he is constantly asking himself: "If it is right for me? Is it right for them?"

He explained that he hasn't "stopped loving Stacey. I haven't stopped needing her in my life."

When he talks about her to his friends, "they're not necessarily comfortable," he said.

Nor are family members. During the initial years, setting a place at the table for Stacey on Rosh Hashanah helped Levitt and his wife cope with the loss at a stressful time. But when their two surviving daughters told them they were uncomfortable with the setting, "we respected their feelings," he said.

In her address, Grief, an expert in bereavement, said it is common for bereaved people to wonder if their feelings are normal. "No expert can tell you what's right or wrong. You're entitled to feel whatever you feel," she said.

And the pattern of grief varies from one individual to the next, she noted. "There is no consensus among experts on the pattern of grief," she said. "Grief is timeless and limitless."

She said losing a child profoundly affects people in so many ways and can have devastating consequences; an unexpected and traumatic death, like that of a child, can intensify bereavement.

The loss of a loved one, said Grief, can lead to depression and other psychiatric and medical complications, including anxiety, insomnia and hallucinations.

But grief "is not a disease or disorder," she stressed. "It's a human experience, and each person experiences it differently."

Bereavement, said Grief, effects relationships profoundly, changing the structure and dynamics; it's hard for bereaved people to spend time with people who don't understand their situation, especially during holiday celebrations. "The happiness around you is a reminder of what you have lost," she said.

"Life is frivolous until it's jolted [by tragedy]," said Rabbi Cahana. "And there will be a different world between you and others."

Grief is a very isolating experience, he added "The community has an obligation not to let the person be isolated," he said.

Yiddish folk music class offered

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Allan Merovitz is starting a class in Yiddish folk music because he wants to try to keep the language alive.

"My ultimate objective is to form a Yiddish choir because I have a long history of singing and teaching the language," he said.

"There's an incredible interest in Yiddish right now. You just have to look at the university calendars to know that."

He is working on a musical adaptation of I.B. Singer's short stories for a Chanukah production at the Young People's Theatre in 2001.

In addition, a story told to him by his grandmother about a brave girl who saved a boy in her little village has inspired Esther the Brave, a forthcoming production still in development.

"It mirrors the [Purim] story of Esther," he said.

Among his favourite folksongs, he said, are Yam Lid, Lomir Ale In Eynem and Rebeynu's Tam, which he will teach in his classes.

He gives credit for help with much of his research to the late Mira Rifelowitcz of Holland, a child of survivors, who organized a Yiddish festival in Amsterdam.

"She was a wonderful woman who died young at the age of 62 and fought for human rights causes."

Merovitz met her five years ago when he took a production of The Chaseneh to Holland, a country which he said always gave his work a good reception.

His classes start Oct. 10, for 10 weeks, 7:30 to 9 p.m. Tuesdays, at the First Nareyever Synagogue, 187 Brunswick Ave. For more information, call 416-516-4856.

Oberammergau revisited

Oberammergau: The Troubling Story of the World's Most Famous Passion Play* by James Shapiro, Random House, $37

Every 10 years in the small Catholic Bavarian village of Oberammergau, a Passion Play is produced using almost half of the townspeople as actors. This tradition has been maintained for 350 years.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The play, which runs for seven hours, entails seven months of rehearsals. The performances are given over a five-month period. About half a million tourists come to view this spectacle in which – until 20 years ago – Jews were portrayed as villains and Christ-killers.

For many Jews and sensitive Christians, the play was regarded as the "longest-running exercise in religious anti-Semitism." As far back as 1860, a Scottish visitor described the play this way: "The Jewish race appeared hateful in your eyes, as you watched them gathering round the cross, looking upon the man they had crucified, and railing at him, and taunting him with his powerlessness and his pain.

"Then for the first time, you seemed to understand the significance of those ungovernable explosions that in the history of the Middle Ages one reads of, when sudden outbursts of hatred against the Hebrew race have taken place, and have been followed by cruelties and barbarities unrivaled in history."

Shapiro writes: "As someone who also writes and teaches about the interplay of art and anti-Semitism, I was disheartened by the ways in which this unbroken tradition had helped sustain the troubling legacy of medieval anti-Judaism. Like Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, Richard Wagner's music and Ezra Pound's Cantos, the Oberammergau play appeared to be one of those works of art whose virtues were deeply compromised."

Eventually things changed for the better. In the 1960s, American Jewish organizations began a vigorous protest and boycott of the play. More significantly, in 1965, the Second Vatican Council officially abandoned the old church doctrine of the collective guilt of the Jewish people in the death of Jesus. Oberammergau had to change, but the struggle, as Shapiro indicates, was protracted and often bitter.

Shapiro writes: "One by one, the details of their play were shown to be ahistorical. They were urged to eliminate their reductive use of the term 'Pharisee,' get rid of Moses' horns; cut from the play stereotypic and ahistorical Jewish characters; call Jesus by his Hebrew name Yeshua. The Last Supper should look less like a da Vinci painting and more like the Passover seder it was; and so on.

"The production of 1990 incorporated most of these, and the one in 2000 will go considerably further – satisfying the historians and critics and healing the second major wound opened by the play."

The cumulative aim of these revisions was not only to make the play less offensive, but also to change the story line. Instead of an opposition between Jews and Christians, the story leading up to Jesus' death is transformed into an intra-Jewish squabble that turns deadly only when the occupying Roman forces get involved.

He ends on a positive note: "If there is any residual anti-Semitism in Oberammergau, I did not see it. Quite the contrary. After all the years of criticism, after having the charge of anti-Semitism thrown at them time and again, the villagers of Oberammergau were unusually self-aware, though still sensitive on this subject."

The author is a professor of literature at Columbia University and his earlier book, Shakespeare and the Jews, was widely admired for its scholarship. Now he has taken a complex and troubling subject and rendered it into a many-sided and absorbing cultural history.

Deri's socio-religious movement

By RABBI YECHIEL BEN AYON

Aryeh Deri was to begin his three-year sentence on Sunday, Sept. 3. The left applauded the conviction as a triumph for the rule of law over a corrupt politician. The right cried foul, seeing it as a naked attempt to neutralize a political nuisance.

Through A Sephardi Window

Some might have thought that the decade-long saga of Aryeh Deri would end with his incarceration. To the great chagrin (or glee, depending on your vantage), no one thinks so now, as even a mostly hostile media has had to concede. His send-off, in their own words, was described as "massive," "extravagant" and "unprecedented."

First, on the previous Thursday night, a rally numbering over 20,000 supporters and well-wishers gathered in Jerusalem's Binyanay Haouma complex.

Then at midnight Saturday, 5,000, mostly men, attended a Selichot service (Sephardim begin reciting Selichot as of Rosh Chodesh Elul), at which Deri gave an address.

Nothing, however, compared to Sunday. The location of the jail was not determined till the last minute. When Matisyahu, a facility outside Ramle, was announced, yet another rally was hastily planned outside its gates. Hundreds of buses were leased to bring supporters from around the country.

The main caravan was to leave Jerusalem at 10 a.m. for the 45-minute ride to Ramle. Hundreds of buses vied for space with tens of thousands of private automobiles. Banners stretched high over a road, which itself was littered with political posters and flyers. The streets leading out of Jerusalem were lined with people; schoolchildren came out of classrooms to wave flags and posters. About a dozen vehicles were outfitted with large, loud amplifiers whose music lent a festive touch to a defiant march.

The caravan inched its way along and totally filled the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway. What should be a ride of less than an hour took me close to three! Helicopters of various design hovered above. Several landed at the side of the road to take better photographs.

As so many vehicles could not be accommodated, the police in Jerusalem began limiting access to the city, then closed the highway outright. The last part of the trip was a half-hour walk.

CNN reported 200,000 people at the rally, with perhaps another 200,000 held back. There were men, women and children of Sephardi and Ashkenazi origin (one speech was made in Yiddish!) and the assembly even included several thousand Arabs and Druze representatives.

The event itself was a combination political rally/spiritual revival. Popular artists shared the stage with venerable sages. Deri was presented, lauded, applauded, serenaded and exonerated by speaker after speaker. Most of all, he was told he would not be forgotten or relegated to the position of political has-been.

While the throngs slowly dispersed, some chose to remain behind. That same day, large tents (later augmented by portables) became the site of an impromptu yeshiva – Ohel Arye.

Now, chartered buses still come regularly (on the hour from Jerusalem), bringing an average of 3,000 supporters nightly. Dormitory facilities are becoming more elaborate, Shabbat hospitality, by reservation only, is booked well beyond the holidays. Someone chose to circumcise his child here, and 400 guests were delighted to hear the baby's name – Aryeh, naturally.

The Thursday midnight Selichot on Sept. 7 drew 50,000 worshippers, supporters and protesters against the government. All available apartments in neighbouring Lod and Ramle have been leased for the holidays and services will continue even then. Deri's jailing has turned him into a martyr and spurred a spiritual revival that leaves one wide-eyed. A nationwide petition for a presidential pardon is under way; 24 members of parliament have signed a separate petition.

If anyone fantasized that they could divest themselves of a leader, and thereby disperse the socio-religious movement Deri created, he or she had better awaken to reality. In Israel, leadership alternatives have for some time been dismal if not outright negligible, and the name Aryeh Deri is now being touted.

Yom Kippur – tshuvah

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Perhaps the most moving moment of the High Holy Day services is the recitation of Unetaneh Tokef prayer: "On New Year's Day the decree is inscribed and on the Day of Atonement it is sealed: how many shall pass away and how many shall be born; who shall live and who shall die." [http://www.ou.org/chagim/roshhashannah/unetanehtext.htm] After enumerating several horrible ways to perish, the congregation exclaims: "But tshuvah (repentance) and tfillah (prayer) and tzedakah (charity) remove the evil of the decree!"

Today, how to understand tshuvah using the World Wide Web.

There are dozens of sites that explain tshuvah and how we can attain it. Many point out that "repentance" really isn't a very good translation for the word. In her article, New Year's Resolutions, Robin Treistman explains that the more accurate translation of tshuvah is "returning – returning to the desirable path." [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/resolute.htm]

How to get back on the path? The Aish Hatorah takes a practical tack in its article, Teshuva: Dry Cleaning for the Soul [http://aish.com/holidays/the_high_holidays/last/teshuva.htm]. It explains that the process of tshuvah involves four steps:

- Regret – Realize the extent of the damage and feel sincere regret.
- Cessation – Immediately stop the harmful action.
- Confession – Articulate the mistake and ask for forgiveness.
- Resolution – Make a firm commitment not to repeat it in the future.

In an attempt to drive the message home, Virtual Jerusalem provides an online Teshuva Self-improvement Chart [http://www.vjholidays.com/rosh/teshuva.htm]. You are challenged to ask yourself difficult questions like: "When did I last give a compliment to someone I really care for; someone I don't so much care for? What gives me meaning in life?"

But how do you convey concepts of tshuvah to young people? The Jewish Theological Seminary site has some suggestions [http://www.learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/together/yomkippur/doingtesh.shtml]. In order to get kids to understand that tshuvah is not an obscure theory but something very practical, the site lists some common misdeeds. (e.g. Jonathan borrowed his brother's Frisbee without asking and lost it. Abby called someone names in school.) It then asks kids to explain how they would achieve tshuvah.

There are many more thought-provoking sites on tshuvah on the Internet. Orthodox Union has summarized some midrashim about ba'alei tshuvah, people who have repented. [http://www.ou.org/chagim/elul/bteshuvah.htm]

Rabbi Eliezer Finkelman explains the Vidui confession and the recitation of regret for the wrongdoings of the past year [http://www.beth-israel.berkeley.ca.us/rabbi/yom98.html].

And if you'd like to listen to some thought-provoking lectures on tshuvah, then click on 613.org where you can hear Rabbi Aron Tendler explain why love is always having to say you're sorry [http://www.613.org/roshyomkippursuccot.html#teshuva].

The journey of achieving tshuvah is so onerous that Yom Kippur is viewed as a solemn, sombre day. But Aaron Ross has a fascinating essay on tshuvah in which he explains why Jewish tradition actually looks at Yom Kippur as one of the happiest days in the Jewish calendar [http://pages.nyu.edu/~asr209/teshuva.html]. He explains that throughout the entire day of Yom Kippur, we are unsure whether forgiveness will be granted. "However, once the day is done, once we have drained every ounce of our energies into the activities of the day… we are confident that our prayers have worked and that we have been pardoned in the heavenly court. It is then that we can shout and sing, and it is at that moment that the totality of the day culminates in a moment of supreme joy."

The doctor who loved history

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Dr. David Eisen, Toronto's first Jewish radiologist, was always intrigued with Jewish history. The youngest son of a Galician peddler who arrived in Toronto around 1902, David Eisen attended the University of Toronto's medical school from 1917 to 1922, and joined the Mount Sinai Hospital after graduating.

A quarter of a century ago, Eisen published a diary of his medical school years. Although he died in 1987 at the age of 87, his Diary of a Medical Student stands as a modest contribution to the subject of Toronto's Jewish history.

Despite his rigorous studies, Eisen was involved with various Judaic organizations, such as the Toronto Hebrew Students Association, the Menorah Society and the Zionist Institute. He wrote that the city seemed unwilling or unable to accommodate to the growing number of Jews in its midst. "Yom Kippur today," he records on Sept. 26, 1917. "Lectures started but I did not attend. I spent the morning in the recently founded synagogue across the street…"

Perhaps the most interesting entries in Eisen's diary recall the flu epidemic that claimed 58 people in one day, the firecrackers and bonfires on downtown streets upon news of the Armistice, and the Jewish life, glimpsed in passing but telling detail.

Dec. 10, 1917: "The British capture of Jerusalem was announced today. I certainly felt a thrill when I heard about it. I was retrieving my hat and coat from the cloak-room attendant at the Reference Library and noticed the large headlines in the newspaper that he was reading. When I reached Spadina Avenue, I bought all three evening papers…"

Nov. 18, 1918: "Today I noticed in the Star Weekly an article in the form of a review of a book written by a Dr. Rihbany, a Syrian, who pleads the Arab cause and asks America 'to save the Near East' from the rapacious Zionists. Quite a few misleading statements were made by the reviewer, presumably on the basis of what appeared in the book. I wrote a letter to the Star criticizing the review."

In 1957 Eisen published an interesting treatise on Toronto's Jewish doctors, later reprinted as a booklet with a portrait of Moses Maimonides on the cover. Toronto's first Jewish doctor, Samuel Lavine (1875-1959), made his early rounds on a bicycle, but later changed to the "more fashionable, but less dependable, automobile," he noted.

In 1965, Eisen became the chief archivist for Holy Blossom Temple, whose Bulletin often carried delightful little historical pearls from him. He wrote about the city's early Jewish settlers, pioneers in the clothing industry, Toronto's first synagogue, the Richmond Street synagogue, and how Holy Blossom acquired its unusual name.

An habitué of archives and libraries, he discovered a picture of Toronto's first synagogue and made a comprehensive study of burials in the 150-year-old Pape Avenue cemetery. He wrote about Rabbi Elzas, an early rabbi, and received an informative letter from Elzas's elderly daughter in New York.

In a column on Arthur Wellington Hart, the first Jew known to live here (from about 1833), he wrote: "Those of our co-religionists who are insurance agents can now hold their occupational heads high in the knowledge that theirs is the oldest Jewish business in Toronto!"

Eisen's diary throws little light on his years at Mount Sinai, which had only 35 beds when he started working there alongside L.J. Solway, A.I. Willinsky, L.J. Breslin and other pioneering Jewish medics. Eisen was not among this first wave of Jewish doctors – but he managed to make his mark on local Jewish history, all the same.

Rabbi Schild receives award from German government

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hate must never be the last word, said Rabbi Erwin Schild last week, on receiving an honour from the Federal Republic of Germany recognizing his contributions to Jewish-Christian dialogue there.

In a ceremony at Adath Israel Congregation, where he is rabbi emeritus, the 80-year-old honouree spoke of his initial "hesitations and compunctions" when the then-consul general of Germany, Wiprecht von Treskow, broached the subject of the rabbi's receiving the Officer's Cross of the Federal Order of Merit – considered comparable to the Order of Canada. Earlier this year, Germany's president, Johannes Rau, made the honour official.

Hate must never be the last word

"I'm glad that I agreed to accept this honour, for a number of good reasons," said Rabbi Schild, a native of Cologne who was imprisoned briefly in Dachau in 1938. He sees the award as a "token of [Germany's] desire ... and an expression of my response."

With the bright red cross standing out in contrast to the lapel of his suit jacket, where German Consul General Christiane Geissler-Kuss had just pinned it, Rabbi Schild recalled that before the Nazis came to power in 1933, Germany "was our Vaterland [fatherland], the land that we loved, the land with whose culture we identified, whose songs we sang and whose music we enjoyed and whose theatres we attended, whose literature we read."

When he learned the fate of his parents, who had perished in the Riga ghetto, and of other family members and friends, his reaction was "hatred. Hatred. I hated Germany. I'm not proud of it, and I'm not ashamed of it. It was a natural, normal, healthy reaction ... [but] it must not be the point at which we stop."

Germany has changed, as has Canada, said Rabbi Schild, noting that he speaks to Germans not only as a Jew but also as a Canadian.

"It isn't easy to be a child of survivors ... but I'm sure it's also not easy to be the children or the grandchildren of the perpetrators," he said. Young Germans today are "wrestling with the burden of their past."

Over the past two decades, Rabbi Schild has visited Germany numerous times to talk to German Christians about Judaism, following an initial invitation in 1982.

He is currently preparing for an upcoming visit, noted Geissler-Kuss, who praised the rabbi for his magnetism, warmth and positive leadership. His talks attract "a growing circle of younger listeners," she noted.

On one trip alone, in 1997, Rabbi Schild gave almost two dozen lectures, sponsored primarily by Catholic and Protestant churches. The German edition of his book, World Through My Window, has sold more copies than the English version, he said.

For those Germans who "seek so seriously," the rabbi said, "we can't be frozen perpetually in the shape of victims. We have to come out of this deep freeze, open our hands, our hearts and our minds" to establish a viable relationship. It will take many generations, but if we don't make a beginning, it will never happen."

The final word, he stressed, must be rapprochement.

Greater Toronto Area

RJCO to handle small community campaigns

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Why is this campaign different from all other campaigns?

In the case of Ontario's 26 "regional" Jewish communities — the new, preferred designation for unfederated communities — the money raised in this year's UJA campaign will be split half-and-half between local and overseas needs, unless it is specifically designated by the donor for a particular sector.

The campaign will also be run under a new umbrella, the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO), a partnership — but not a merger — between Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC).

Previously, CJC handled programming for the regional communities and UIAFC dealt with fund-raising. The majority of the funds raised went to Israel and Jewish communities overseas. Local programs for the smaller communities were funded by Congress with money raised from campaigns run in the larger, federated communities: Toronto, Hamilton, London, Ottawa and Windsor.

"For the first time, the regional communities will have a say over the funds, as far as how they're spent for local needs," said Dov Harris, director of financial resource development, in his UIAFC office at the Lipa Green building. "Before, the funding for local programs came out of Congress and was solely controlled by Congress."

"Now the financing model is catching up with the programming model. If we want more programming, we need more financing," said Richard Kizell, RJCO chair.

A born-and-bred resident of Kingston whose parents, Ray and Joan, have taken an active role as chairs in past campaigns, Kizell – a 44-year-old financial planner – said he and other regional community leaders want to see the new structure as "evolutionary, not revolutionary... Everyone agrees that more money needs to be spent locally.

"I think it's still new for most of the communities," he said of the restructuring. "We're still in the stage of explaining it to the communities."

Overseas needs are not being neglected, stressed Harris. "There are some desperate situations in the former Soviet Union which need our help. We take as our credo, 'Kol Yisrael Areivim Zeh B'Zeh,' meaning a Jew in our Ontario region is as important to us as a Jew in the former Soviet Union, or in Addis Ababa – or anywhere, for that matter."

Last year the regional campaign raised $550,000, of which more than 90 percent went overseas. Local programs received about $120,000 from CJC.

The new system will "simplify what was once a very complex process," said Michael Soberman, CJC's director of community development for the regional Jewish Communities of Ontario, who was interviewed along with Harris. The pair have already begun this season's treks to the regional communities, which range from Thunder Bay to the Niagara Peninsula.

Among the services offered, said Soberman, are youth programs, such as a three-year high school outreach program, with twice-yearly Shabbatonim culminating in a trip to Israel. New programs being discussed include a graduate program for older teens not yet in university, along with a parent-teen dialogue on issues pertaining to Jewish identity, anti-Semitism and the role of Israel.

They would like to fund a travelling rabbi/educator program too, he added.

Soberman, who now handles the campaign's management and promotion – freeing up Harris to concentrate on bequests and endowments – has three staffers reporting to him at CJC: Fauna Mandel, high school outreach and family education co-ordinator; Shula Saltzman, senior educational consultant; and Roseanne Brown, director of regional Jewish campus organizations.

Their respective areas of expertise address what Kizell said is one of the regional priorities: getting younger people involved in a leadership capacity. Other issues, he noted, include aging, assimilation, and a shrinking Jewish population.

Campaign organizers hope to increase the funds raised, and also hope to see an increased rate of participation, meaning more individuals or families donating, added Soberman. Last year, he noted, there were about 700 givers, constituting about 70 percent of potential donors. Now that the partnership has come into effect, as of June 4, he has become aware of even more potential givers, he said.

"We used to talk about Israel, national and local," said Maxyne Finkelstein, UIAFC executive director. "Now we're talking about what needs are in the Jewish world."

Krofchick leads student council at Huron College

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To the best of Harris Krofchick's knowledge, he is the first Jewish student council president at Huron College, an Anglican affiliate of the University of Western Ontario, established in 1867.

Elected in February, the 20-year-old administrative commercial studies major represents 900 social science and theology students, sits on the college's executive board as well as numerous committees, and oversees a budget in the tens of thousands of dollars.

Last year he served as sports commissioner, and designed the logo on Huron College clothing.

Representing his fellow students on the committee to select a new principal for the college is his "biggest honour," he said.

"My goal is to raise awareness and get people involved," Krofchick told The CJN in a phone interview from his Huron College office.

The Toronto native is very enthusiastic about his school. "The reason I chose Huron – and I'm glad I did – is that it's got a small class environment," he said. "And the student council is really there to help the students. That's what I love the most."

Helping may just be in Krofchick's blood. His history of volunteer involvements includes teaching Special Olympics swimming to children with physical and mental disabilities, volunteering with the Passover food drive, assisting with the blood drive at his high school (Forest Hill Collegiate), and at events like Purim carnivals at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Technically, his current position is not with student council any more. Last year the council incorporated, adopting the name Huron College Student Event and Affairs Corporation.

The council has three dozen members and is expected to have an international representative within the next few weeks. Krofchick proposed the idea because of a recent influx of students from around the world, including almost two dozen from China through a university exchange program. Huron also has students from France, Sweden, South Africa and Israel, he said.

Krofchick estimates that between 30 and 40 percent of Huron students are Jewish. For that reason, he was also behind a Huron-based chapter of Western's Jewish Students' Union, which received the green light last week. He expects JSU Huron will run events independently as well as in conjunction with the main campus.

A JSU member since first year, Krofchick visited Israel for the first time on a Birthright trip in February.

Among the Huron events on which Krofchick has been working was a recent "coffee house," but the name doesn't do it justice, he stressed. "We had people come up and read poetry, tell jokes, just people hanging out and having a good time." All 250 participants stayed until the event was over at 1 a.m., he noted.

The party was significant not only because it was successful, but because there was no liquor. "This was one of the things we were trying to do to get away from the whole party mentality … you don't have to drink to have a good time."

Once the OAC year is dropped from Ontario's high school curriculum (students currently in Grade 10 will be the first year to graduate after Grade 12), the percentage of students who have reached legal drinking age will drop dramatically, he pointed out.

"We've started dropping some of the alcohol events."

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Israel's current challenge will be to seize the opportunities arising from the forthcoming peace with the Palestinians, said Harvey Krueger, vice-president of Lehman Brothers, a U.S. investment bank.

"I believe there will be peace," Krueger said at a weekend conference featuring many of the Hebrew University's leading academics.

Krueger delivered the opening lecture on Israel's Evolving Role in the Global Economy, as part of a 75th anniversary celebration of the Hebrew University.

Today, Harvey Krueger said, Israel must confront the challenges posed by the forthcoming peace with the help of its intellectuals, so that the country will continue on its path as a successful partner in the global economy.

It will be the university's scientists, Arabists, philosophers, historians, culturalists and teachers who will help Israel meet the challenges posed by the forthcoming peace with the Palestinians, he said.

"It will require great patience, sensitivity and cultural understanding to create an attitude of economic partnership and mutual and fair co-operation... to understand the sensitivities and to probe for the solutions to decades of hostilities."

Furthermore, "the peace process, when successfully concluded, will bring a modern economy into direct contact with an underdeveloped, and to a large degree undereducated people," he said.

However, Krueger added, it is possible for Israel to build an economic relationship with the Palestinians based on the outsourcing of its high-tech products.

Harvey Krueger

Until now, Israel has outsourced to Ireland and to India, and both countries have benefited from this relationship.

Yet "how do you show the Palestinians that what is OK with India and Ireland is not exploitation to them? How do you prove that it is not economic aggression to outsource and that it is not a substitute for political aggression?"

Over the years, Israel has "emerged from a socialist state into a true free enterprise system which thrives and continues to earn the confidence of the international investment community."

Today, Israeli investments are traded in stock markets without "an Israeli discount or a patriotic premium," Krueger said.

"This is long way from Israel's first 25 years when demand outstripped productive capacity, efficiency was subordinate to output and profits were considered immoral.

"At that time, over 50 percent of Israel's entire industrial base was owned by the government or the Histadrut and much of the remaining 50 percent was controlled indirectly by the banks, which in turn were owned by the government or the Histadrut."

Then for the 10 years after 1973, he said, "Israel was a maturing state in a very painful position... Growth slowed, sometimes getting down to zero. Inflation began to slip out of control – suddenly it was 500 percent – and unemployment began."

From overemployment to underemployment in a small state is a major social and cultural wrench, he said.

"There was high currency volatility ... and in 1983 there was a major, major stock market crash. Foreign investment disappeared."

Finally, then-prime minister Shimon Peres and finance minister Yitzhak Moda'i led an economic reform, resulting in tight credit and high interest rates.

There were many business failures and very high unemployment, Krueger said. But as a result of these "Draconian fiscal and monetary policies," there emerged a stable tax policy, a restructuring of labour union or Histadrut owned industries and the international recognition of Israel's leading non-governmental companies in the global markets.

This, coupled with Israel's most important natural resource – its highly educated people – has enabled the country to fuel the extraordinarily impressive growth of a high-tech industry second to none today in the world.

Yet several problems have emerged as a result of this economic growth and viability. Today in Israel, differences have emerged between the old industry and the new industry, between low-tech workers and high-tech workers. And what that means is that class distinctions will inevitably occur, Krueger said.

"Israel, however, has always been egalitarian and has worked hard to be sure that everyone in the state had an equal and fair opportunity. We'll have to redouble those efforts."

One of the answers may be in peace, Krueger noted, which is now the object of almost everybody in the Middle East, because one of the problems with the old industry is that domestic markets are too small. Those markets can be enhanced by regional co-operation, and broader markets will benefit everyone.

"Israel is young and vibrant and it has proved itself resourceful. It will, over time, meet these challenges as it has so many others. And similarly, the Hebrew University is able... to provide the intellectual stimulation and the resources to help this country do so."

Israel is a country without many natural resources. But the fact is that it is only through the training of the real natural resource of Israel, the intellect, that Israel has been able to achieve the enormous strides that it has – and they have relied, then and now, on the Hebrew University to train that intellect, Krueger said.

"The continuity of the university is the continuity of all of us," he said.

Gerry Halbert, a former past president himself, paid tribute to the past presidents of the Toronto chapter; and Hebrew University vice-president Moshe Arad acknowledged Mark Gryfe, vice-president of external development, who will be leaving Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Ronnie Appleby, who co-chaired the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University event with his wife Bunnie Appleby, said today our relationship with Israel should include seeking out ways to invest and partner in the economic miracle that's currently taking place in Israel.

Seventy-five years ago, one of the most daunting challenges facing Israel, before its birth, was the establishment of Hebrew as a vital language.

And so, Appleby noted, when the Hebrew University opened its doors to the world in 1925, Albert Einstein delivered the first lecture – and his first few words were in Hebrew.

Jewish groups urge Senate to keep anti-Nazi procedures intact

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Jewish organizations have recommended that a Senate committee studying Bill C-16 allow the bill to pass without amending the present denaturalization and deportation procedure used against suspected Nazi war criminals.

Canadian Jewish Congress and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre submitted briefs to a Senate committee studying the proposed act, saying the bill as it now stands provides an adequate remedy for deporting war criminals while protecting the legal rights of suspects.

"Congress is concerned that revising the section in Bill C-16 dealing with citizenship revocation will open the door to a new constitutional challenge. This could chill action on Nazi war crimes cases precisely when time is of the essence in pursuing justice against the perpetrators," said Congress legal counsel Jack Silverstone.

"I think the act is a good balance between the rights of individuals and the requirements of society," said Leo Adler, representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

During debate on Bill C-16 in the House of Commons, supporters of Nazi killing unit member Helmut Oberlander lobbied for changes that would take the revocation of citizenship out of the hands of cabinet and make it part of a judicial process. They argued the absence of the right to appeal a Federal Court finding of fact, as to whether a suspect lied to gain admittance to Canada, is unfair.

Their opposition to Bill C-16 was joined by MP Andrew Talegdi, the former parliamentary secretary to Citizenship and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan. He resigned his post when the government refused to include amendments that would allow for an appeal of the judge's decision.

Under current procedure, a Federal Court judge holds a trial to determine whether a suspect gained admittance to Canada by concealing his wartime activities. His finding of fact is forwarded to the immigration minister who brings it to cabinet, which decides whether to strip the suspect of citizenship.

Legal researcher Kenneth Narvey, chief operating officer of the Montreal-based Coalition of Concerned Congregations, said during the House debate that "the present system is bad for everybody. The government can't appeal and the friends of the accused feel it's unfair not to have the right to appeal."

David Matas, honorary legal counsel of B'nai Brith, said he favoured amendments to the Bill which would allow appeals from trial court decisions. Such a step could expedite legal remedies against Nazi war criminals, he said.

However Congress and the Wiesenthal Centre disagree. "We do not believe that at this late stage, we can possibly entertain a new regime that will take us into the realm of legal unknowns," Silverstone said.

He pointed out that, as a result of the appeals resulting from the Finta case, "we lost five years."

יורם פירוצקי מדווח מניו יורק

Survivors honoured in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — In his remarks to Canadian Holocaust survivors, their families and friends at the end of a day in which 55 survivors were recognized and honoured on Parliament Hill, defence minister Art Eggleton expressed his desire to see a Holocaust museum established in Ottawa.

The building of a permanent, freestanding Holocaust museum in Ottawa has long been on the agenda of the Canadian Jewish establishment, and of survivors eager to see their legacy perpetuated.

"While I would love to announce here tonight that we have jumped all the hurdles, we are getting there and we will continue to have the determination to get there," Eggleton told the gathering at the Westin Hotel last Wednesday.

"You have made an indelible mark on Canadian life," he told the survivors, who came to the capital from across Canada. "With the same will, the same determination and the same strength that allowed you to survive, you made Canada your home."

Earlier in the day, the survivors were saluted in the House of Commons with remarks from Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

"You have not only witnessed and endured the worst of man's inhumanity to man, but somehow found in the well-springs of your own humanity the courage to go on, to rebuild your lives as you helped build your communities here in Canada," Cotler said.

A special ceremony was held later in which Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray and Secretary of State Hedy Fry participated. Joel Dimitry, a former chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, noted that in a parliamentary chamber only metres away, government bureaucrats had plotted their "none is too many" policy on Jewish immigration to Canada on the eve of World War II.

Last week's event was held to mark the 55th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration and death camps, and to pay tribute to the estimated 20,000 Holocaust survivors who made Canada their home after the war.

Immigration and citizenship minister Elinor Caplan noted that Canada and Israel are the only countries in the world to officially recognize and honour those who have survived the Shoah.

Conceding that there have been some "dark moments" in Canada's history when immigration policy has not been kind to Jews, Caplan said Canada has learned from the lessons of the past and is now "a country that guarantees a fair hearing to anyone who comes and claims persecution."

She acknowledged the contributions of the Holocaust survivors: "You came here to rebuild your lives and, in the process, you built this country."

The event was organized by B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre, Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada.

Zukerman returns to Israel with NAC Orchestra tour

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — World-renown conductor Pinchas Zukerman returns to the Israel this week as he leads the National Arts Centre (NAC) Orchestra on its most extensive overseas trip in years.

Zukerman, 52, returns to Tel Aviv, his birthplace, this week as the NAC Orchestra begins its tour with two concerts there today and tomorrow (Oct. 5 and 6). These shows will be followed by a performance this Saturday (Oct 7) in Amman, Jordan, after which the New York-based maestro and the orchestra will head to Europe for dates in Germany, Switzerland, Italy, France, England and Scotland.

The tour, which will be funded by corporate sponsorships, the federal government, fund-raising and the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, marks many firsts. These include the first tour of the Middle East by a Canadian orchestra, and the first performance in an Arab country by Zukerman, the NAC Orchestra musical director.

Another significant first is the invitation to Zukerman and an ensemble of NAC Orchestra musicians to teach at a music conservatory in Palestinian-controlled Ramallah on the "West Bank."

Also during the visit to Tel Aviv, Zukerman will lead a collaborative learning program, "Dialog Through Music," with school children from Israel, Canada and the Palestinian Authority. The program will be taught using broadband Internet technology and curricula developed in partnership with the National Research Council, Communications Research Centre Canada and the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation.

Zukerman hopes to contribute to the peace process in his homeland through the sharing of music and culture. "I am particularly honoured to have been requested by the Prime Minister to consider ourselves as cultural diplomats for Canada," he said.

"This is a remarkable opportunity to allow the musicians and the music they make to be a bridge between peoples and countries."

Ottawa JCC to remain closed on Shabbat

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A recent vote by its board of directors has ensured that the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC) will retain its status as one of the few Jewish community centres in North America to remain closed on Shabbat.

Since the opening of its new facility in 1998, the SJCC has received requests from some members for Saturday afternoon access, primarily to its fitness and aquatics facilities. With the newly-elected board of directors reflecting a more diverse demographic, some of its newer members wished to address the issue of opening the centre on Shabbat.

"I was amenable to having the issue explored, but I wanted to be able to go through a proper, constructive process," said SJCC President Ian Sherman.

"We agreed that we would collect information through a series of focus groups, meetings with other beneficiary agencies, community leaders, the shuls and major donors, and that we would hire an independent consultant to facilitate the process and to prepare a report. All of that was done and then we voted."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka applauded the board's decision. "The Centre board and its president deserve our full appreciation for the integrity with which they carried out this delicate process and the dedication to community which informed their decision," he said.

"It is noteworthy that in the community consultations on this issue, the eye-opener for many was the strongly expressed view of many not necessarily identified as personally Shabbat-observant, who nevertheless felt the centre opening on Shabbat would be an unwelcome departure from our time-honoured respect for age-old tradition."

The board voted overwhelmingly in favour of the status quo. "The SJCC must incorporate all Jews, regardless of Jewish affiliation and philosophy, and all Jews must regard our centre as their home, as a place where they belong," said Sherman.

"As such, I hope we serve as both the catalyst and foundation for deep commitment, love and mutual respect between all Jews.

"For the SJCC to opt for one denomination's concept of Shabbat observance, for us to claim that one specific philosophy has a monopoly on what constitutes authentic Judaism, will be to totally undermine our goal as a community centre for all Jews."

Rabbi Bulka said he appreciates the magnitude of the board's decision. "Most JCCs across North America are open on Shabbat," he said. "We have always felt unique in our centre being closed, as indeed are all our community Jewish institutions.

"But the uniqueness is not merely in being different; it is in our sense of community, our working together in a spirit of respect and understanding. The vote by the board was not a victory for one side over the other; it was and remains a victory for the community."

Said Rabbi Bulka of the decision: "Their vote to maintain the policy of the centre being closed on Shabbat is a reaffirmation of the togetherness that makes our community click."

TORONTO — The United Way of Greater Toronto's fund-raising target for 2000 is $67.5 million – the charity's largest goal in its 44-year history.

Money raised will help more than one million people in Toronto who turn to United Way's 200 community agencies every year.

The United Way funds a network of health and social service agencies which provide services to young children, youth, families, abused women, the homeless, newcomers, seniors, people in crisis and the disabled.

It also funds several Jewish communal agencies and organizations.

The 2000 goal is more than $4.7 million higher than last year's goal and $4.4 million more than last year's record $63.1 million achievement.

In July, United Way of Greater Toronto announced $1.9 million in new spending – a 27 percent increase over 1999 – to be distributed to a record number of 62 constituent member agencies. Much of this new money will help prevent and alleviate homelessness and support newcomers to Canada.

All funding levels to Jewish communal agencies and groups will remain the same this year, with two exceptions:

The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre received a $15,000 increase to expand its outreach and integration program for immigrant youth. This program is designed primarily for Russian Jewish youth and will focus on athletics, developing leadership skills, mentoring and integration into Canadian life. BJCC's total allocation for 2000 is $384,696, up from $369,696 in 1999.

The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care had a mutual agreement with United Way to drop its annual allocation by $10,000, to $330,079. This decrease is in no way based on the agency's performance.

The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living: $143,080; Bloor Jewish Community Centre: $101,412; Jewish Family and Child Service of Toronto: $1,366,033; Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto: $402,916; Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa: $44,170, in addition to a grant of $12,870; and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto: $45,701.

As it did last year, the Jewish Camp Council elected not to receive United Way funds because it is restructuring. The council is still a United Way member agency.

Ben Wicks remembered for his 'Jewish heart'

By MONTY MAZIN

Ben Wicks will forever be remembered as a man of humour and humanity.

What I admired about Ben, my closest and dearest friend, was that he was a decent, caring, compassionate humanitarian. A mentsch — who performed good deeds (mitzvot) with a joyous heart.

Guest Voice

Ben was not Jewish. But he had a Jewish heart and a Jewish kop (head).

We were born Cockneys (within the sound of Bow Bells, London) and shared many common interests — love of people (especially children) helping the underprivileged, the poor, and those in desperate need.

Ben's humble beginnings in England were what gave him a strong rapport with people from all walks of life.

In 1997 he relived a call from his publisher, Bloomsbury of Great Britain, to say he had been commissioned to write a book to commemorate the 50th anniversary of Israel.

I'll always remember his excitement when he told me the news, and my own excitement and joy when he said: "Monty! You are going to be my interviewer and researcher."

Ben started out with the intention of telling the story of the birth of the modern State of Israel. But the book turned out to be more than that.

He wrote: "This is the story of a people which through its incredible courage overcame obstacles that most of us would find insurmountable."

His final words read: "What do those people who built a nation out of rock and sand have in common? Each one can look back with pride to a period of pain, courage and endurance…It is the story of the birth of a nation — a home for the Jewish people, who had been wanderers for so long: a home called Israel."

Ben Wicks bestowed on my wife Blema and myself one of the greatest honours we could ever wish for — he dedicated the book to us.

Internationally renown as a cartoonist, writer, journalist and broadcaster, Ben Wicks' greatest accomplishments are his series of Born To Read books – distributed every year to over 2,000,000 children – and the I Dot Can program seen daily on the internet (www.benwicks.com.), both of which promote literacy.

Ben Wicks lived and departed this world with an imperishable crown of good name. He has left his family and all of us with a legacy that will forever be cherished.

Losing Ben was very painful. It is truly consoling to know from the extent of tributes from people of all walks of life, how much he was loved, admired and respected by those who knew him and whose lives he touched. He is deeply missed.

"Happy is the man who has Acquired a good name,
And retains it when he departs
This world." (Talmud Berochot)

Alfred "Ben" Wicks' was the creator of the syndicated cartoon strip The Outcasts, which was picked up by more than 200 newspapers. Wicks was also an esteemed literacy promoter, writer, journalist and broadcaster. He was 73.

Winnipeg celebrates century of Jewish music

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's Jewish community is celebrating 100 years of Jewish music and musicians with an exhibit organized by the Jewish Heritage Centre (JHC) of Western Canada.

The exhibit, Our Musical Heritage: A Century of Jewish Musicians and Music in Winnipeg, opened Sept. 16 at the Ed and Marion Vickar Jewish Museum at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

"This is the biggest initiative that we have ever undertaken," said JHC president Roz Usiskin in her remarks at a ceremony to formally open the exhibit. "We believe that we are the first Jewish community in Canada to have taken on a project of this kind."

The three-month exhibit showcases the evolution of Jewish music in Winnipeg over the past century, ranging from the songs and melodies brought here by some of the first Jewish immigrants from Europe, to compositions of modern Winnipeg Jewish musicians such as Sid Robinovitch and Aharon Harlap (formerly Charloff).

Pride of place in the exhibit goes to legendary giants such as the late Cantor Benjamin Brownstone and the late Sarah Udow, as well as the Chai Folk Ensemble, which Udow founded more than 35 years ago, and the Jewish Women's Musical Club.

Usiskin recognized Noach Witman, long-time Yiddish-language radio host and Winnipeg's senior proponent of Yiddish, for donating most of his extensive collection of records and tapes to the JHC.

The exhibit is one of three components of a larger JHC project celebrating the roots and development of Jewish music in Manitoba. The others are a coffee table book by writer Sharon Chisvin and illustrator Gustavo Rymberg, and a series of four concerts in October and November highlighting different aspects of Winnipeg's Jewish musical heritage.

The project was started four or five years ago, Usiskin says, by the Jewish Historical Society (JHS) – a JHC predecessor – when JHS members became aware of how little material they had on Jewish music and musicians in Winnipeg's history.

"When we began building up our music collection, we realized that we had an invaluable treasure here," said Usiskin. "We saw a lot of possibilities."

She emphasized that the museum exhibit is not meant to be the final word on the subject. "A research project like this is never completed," she said.

"This exhibit is meant to be a small representation of a much larger panorama. We know that many documents and photos have still to surface."

Resolutions for the new year

As Canadian Jews join their co-religionists around the world in welcoming the new year, it is a fitting time to offer some New Year's resolutions. So, with every good wish during this High Holy Day season, please accept the following suggestions in the helpful spirit intended.

The honour of one is the honour of all. It is almost touching to see how all Jews stood a little taller and prouder following Joseph Lieberman's nomination as the Democratic vice-presidential candidate. Somehow, Jews feel a visceral connection to other Jews who reflect well on the community-at-large. It should follow then, that Jewish organizations should embrace the success of other Jewish organizations and recognize that the achievements of any one of them in the political sector benefits all, as well as the community as a whole. Unfortunately, the perception among politicians in Ottawa (and more than likely in provincial capitals as well) is that the goal of the agencies, too often, is simply to out-do their "competition." The damage of such a perception is obvious and the risk of a continuation of such behaviour is the marginalization of Jewish groups from the political decision-making process.

The shame of one is the shame of all. Two weeks ago, news broke of a fraudulent charities scheme in Quebec. The dishonesty of one group has (as it inevitably would) cast a pall of suspicion on all charitable activities within the Jewish community. This phenomenon has a wider application. Irresponsible acts, statements and positions impact on the totality of the community. It would be folly for anyone or any organization to think that the non-Jewish world (even in the relatively sophisticated world of politics) distinguishes much between one group and another. "Measure twice and cut once," the saying goes. As it relates to organizations, it should perhaps be said that they ought to "think twice before speaking once."

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Put your money where your mouth is. As all the political parties gear up for an election, the Jewish community is still, for the most part, watching from the sidelines. Unless Jews make a conscious effort to become active in political life (any party, any role), they will be destined to remain, for the most part, passive observers from the sidelines with little ability to contribute to policy issues that matter. Political influence is not an inherent right – even if the position you espouse is legitimate. Become engaged along lines that are important to you. Have a good year.

Yom Kippur in Bergen-Belsen recalled

MONTREAL — Exactly 55 years ago, Abraham Brenner, a Canadian Jewish soldier stationed in Germany, wrote a letter to his Montreal friend Bill Berger, describing what it was like to celebrate Yom Kippur with survivors of the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp.

Bill Berger has since died, but his surviving brother, David, discovered the letter several years ago among his sibling's possessions and deposited the letter in the archives of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre. The centre has since been seeking to establish the whereabouts or fate of Brenner and return the letter to him if he is still alive, or to members of his immediate family.

The centre's efforts to track him down through Veterans Affairs Canada and Jewish war veterans groups, however, have so far proven fruitless. The letter nonetheless remains a moving, vivid and anguished account of that Yom Kippur in Germany 55 years ago. Here it is published in its entirety. Anyone who may know of Brenner's fate can contact Carol Burke at the centre at 514-345-2605.

There we were, 10 Jewish Canadian soldiers. While attending our New Year services at a camp in Hanover, we had heard that there was a Jewish settlement in Celle, Germany, and decided to visit it during the Yom Kippur holiday. When the time came, being granted leave from our various units, we met together, and arrived in Celle a day before Yom Kippur.

Being informed that there were many fellow Jews in nearby Belsen, we unanimously agreed to go over there. After travelling about 30 kilometres, we reached the notorious camp that the world will never forget.

Making our way in, we eventually discovered the Jewish part of the camp. Its people gazed at me in astonishment. This was the first time they had ever seen Canadian soldiers, and it took endless explanations before they finally began to understand that we were those fortunates – Jews from [North] America.

The poor souls encircled us, bombarding us with hundreds of questions. Many were the queries about relatives and friends who had come to Canada during the past few decades. What a pleasure it was to bring news of their distant kinsmen, in those rare cases in which we recognized the names.

The day passed and the time came for Kol Nidre and the ushering in of Yom Kippur. In front of the altar, a Hungarian rabbi officiated. He prayed to the Lord in Yiddish to forgive these people their sins. He was saying these prayers before the same people who had seen their own kin murdered, killed and gassed, for the last six years. These pitiful outcasts were overcome with emotion. The sight was a tragedy – men and women wailing in utter desolation, the men beating their breasts and knocking their heads against the walls of the synagogue.

Amongst the 10 of us, there was not a dry eye nor unbleeding heart, as we realized how fortunate we were to have our families living in Canada and not in Europe. They, at least, had not been condemned, as so many of these people had been, for being Jews.

Kol Nidre was then sung, but not in the manner that we used to hear it back home. It was heart-rending. The rabbi chanted with such broken emotion and tears in his voice that we shall never forget the scene that we witnessed.

The responses of the congregation rang out so loudly that at times it almost sounded as if they were being shouted for the whole world of Jewry to hear.

When the time came for Kaddish to be said, there was not a member in the congregation who did not recite it for a mother, father, wife, husband or child. It was as if the whole was in mourning.

The day services were similar. Fasting meant nothing to these people, for they had fasted not only on Yom Kippur but many times whilst they were in various stalags.

The tragic part of the services for me was that when I recalled former Yom Kippurs, I could remember seeing children there and venerable old Jews. But here, all whom I saw were between the ages of 14 and 40. The children and the old people had perished completely.

On forthcoming Yom Kippurs that we hope to celebrate some day in Canada, those scenes that we were able to see, of what has been done to a people, just because they were Jews, will always live in our memories.

One of the Ten,
Signalman Abraham Brenner

He had a sympathy for Third World countries and may have seen the Palestinians in that light. He feared stirring inter-ethnic tensions in Canada – a reason he gave for his government's cool response to the pursuit of suspected Nazi war criminals in this country.

Still, Trudeau won Jews' admiration for his devotion to human rights and fairness to minorities, his uncompromising stance against separatism, and, of course, for his intellect.

A younger Trudeau had admired Jewish intellectuals. While studying political economy at Harvard University in the 1940s, he wrote how impressed he was with Jewish academics who had fled Hitler.

"It's a sad day, especially in this period of introspection," remarked Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, whom Trudeau appointed in 1969 as the first Jewish member of the federal cabinet. But Gray's faith was never a factor.

"He dealt with people on the basis of their talents, not their background," Gray told The CJN just hours before the start of Rosh Hashanah. "He was interested in building an inclusive society and fostering multiculturalism, which he entrenched in the Constitution.

"He was a giant."

Senator Sheila Finestone, who followed Trudeau as Mount Royal MP, said Jews were attracted to him because of his strong stand on human rights.

In fact, that was why Finestone reluctantly entered politics in 1984.

"Remember, more than half of the Jewish community were immigrants or [Holocaust] survivors when he came on the scene. They had come from places where there were no rights. They had a gut response to him and put a lot of hopes in this man.

"Not everyone loved him," Finestone allowed. "A lot were angry. But at a more fundamental level, the Jewish community trusted him."

They also appreciated that he opened the doors to immigration wider than ever before. Trudeau was not inclined to apologize for the mistakes of the past, but he did learn from them and tried to make things right in his time, she said.

In a statement, Irwin Cotler, current MP for Mount Royal, expressed condolences to the Trudeau family on behalf of the riding's constituents. For them, "Pierre Elliott Trudeau will always be its most distinguished and distinguishable MP," Cotler said.

"But the thing I remember most – and what I believe touched Canadians the most – was his personal courage, his moral courage, inspired by a vision not only of who we were but what we might aspire to be."

Trudeau was "a great friend of the Jewish community," recalled Barney Danson, who served in the late prime minister's cabinet beginning in 1974. "He was a strong supporter of Israel but realized there had to be some balance with the Palestinians."

Danson, the second Jew appointed to the Trudeau cabinet, felt the late leader was "aware of but not preoccupied" with issues on the Jewish agenda.

The matter of Nazi war criminals was not a priority, partly because it had not yet been pushed as one by the Jewish community, Danson told The CJN.

However, it was under Trudeau's watch – and that of former solicitor general Robert Kaplan – that Canada first moved on a Nazi war criminals: Helmut Rauca was extradited to West Germany in 1982.

What mattered more to Trudeau, Danson said, was the Arab economic boycott of Israel, and of companies that did business with Israel. "That deeply, deeply incensed him. That, and sanctions on military goods to Israel."

Danson said Trudeau was always ready to incur the wrath of Arab nations by ignoring the boycott, and in 1979, the Liberals were about to introduce legislation directly addressing the boycott, but were defeated by Joe Clark's Tories.

At the Montreal Jewish community's celebration of Israel's 30th anniversary in 1978, Trudeau gave the keynote address before a crowd of close to 20,000 at the Forum.

He praised Jews for their contribution to mankind in both religion and knowledge, and the accomplishments of Israel in building a nation.

He praised Jews for contribution to mankind

"The Jews who gathered in the Holy Land to form the State of Israel brought to it all the wealth of spirit and intelligence, all the qualities, virtues and gifts that I have mentioned. In a few decades, their presence, the legitimacy of which cannot rightfully be questioned, has literally brought back to life a land that was being eaten away by the desert… a new democracy has been set up.

"In just a few decades an original and marvelously lively culture has grown up. In brief, Israel has constructed one of the most advanced societies in the world."

The very survival of the Jewish people is a "marvel," Trudeau said.

Trudeau did not serve in World War II. He was among the young French-Canadian intellectuals of the day who had doubts about Canada's involvement in a distant conflict.

As Mordecai Richler recalls in the latest issue of Saturday Night magazine, Trudeau, around 1943, was seen riding his motorcycle, wearing a German army uniform, through the back roads of the Laurentians.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region president Dorothy Zalcman Howard called Trudeau "a great statesman, a true friend and a staunch defender of the rights of all minorities.

Danson, who was appointed Trudeau's parliamentary secretary in 1970, recalled the late prime minister having "a warm and cordial" lunch with then-Israeli prime minister Golda Meir in 1974.

But things weren't always so friendly with Menachem Begin, who led Israel into the late 1970s. Begin is the sole Israeli leader Trudeau mentioned in his memoirs, published in 1993.

Begin visited Canada in 1978. Relations between the two leaders were strained. There had been "several good exchanges" with Begin, and Trudeau admired the Israeli leader's willingness to make peace with Egypt. But then Begin wandered into sensitive territory.

"He tried to pressure us to move our Canadian Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem," Trudeau wrote. "This would have been a coup for his government of course."

Trudeau said no, and "Begin became rather nasty about it and said, 'I'm going to tell your voters in Toronto that you're not supporting Israel on this.'

"I told him: 'They already know. You can tell them what you want but I don't think it would be very courteous and I don't think it would be very effective.'

"I knew this because my own constituency in Mount Royal had a large Jewish population and I often took the opportunity to exchange views with my constituents about Israel and the Palestinian issue.

"We turned Begin down flat. But Joe Clark was not so wise, and he later got into a lot of difficulty when he followed the Begin line on moving our embassy to Jerusalem."

Trudeau was a guest, along with then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, at a 1983 State of Israel Bonds dinner honouring Montreal community volunteer and Trudeau friend Sheila Kussner.

In person, Trudeau was not arrogant or cold, Kussner recalled last week. "One on one, he was a lot of fun," she said. "He had a sharp, quick wit and was a great conversationalist. I enjoyed him thoroughly."

In his memoirs, Trudeau also recalls a trip through the Middle East in the summer of 1948, and his subsequent arrest as a Jewish spy.

That year, Palestine was "convulsed" in war over the State of Israel, whose independence had been proclaimed just weeks earlier. He arrived in Amman and was determined to see Jerusalem, which was blockaded by Arab forces. The trip was risky to say the least.

Trudeau jumped aboard a truck loading with Arab soldiers who were leaving for the front. They crossed the Allenby Bridge and made it to Jerusalem.

"It was with immense pleasure that I walked through it, a pleasure mixed with other strong emotions, since I had to cross a street on the outskirts of the Old City under Israeli-Arab fire."

On his way back from a monastery, where he had visited a Canadian Dominican priest, Trudeau found himself in violation of a curfew.

"Two Arab soldiers grabbed me by the collar and without any further formalities, threw me in jail." He was informed that he would be charged with espionage and if he was convicted, the death penalty awaited.

Fortunately, the priest he had visited intervened and persuaded his Arab jailers that Trudeau was a Canadian student and not a spy for the Haganah.

After "not a very pleasant day and night," Trudeau was released and placed aboard another truck back to Amman. But the soldiers on the truck were still convinced that "I was indeed a Jewish spy; they had seen me come out of the prison. The long beard I had at the time made me look even more suspect in their eyes."

The return trip was punctuated by several death threats, until the British Embassy in Amman finally won the young traveller his freedom.

Temple Mount riots: both sides losing control

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Opinion

The riots on the Temple Mount were triggered by a provocative act on the part of Israelis, namely by Likud Chair Ariel Sharon and other Likud MKs, when they visited one of the most sensitive points in the dispute with the Palestinians at the worst possible time.

In contrast, it is certain that the other riots which broke out at around 20 different flash points around the West Bank and the Gaza Strip were instigated by Fatah's Tanzim faction and Palestinian policemen clothed in civilian dress.

The impression that one forms is that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat at some point lost control of the situation in the territories and perhaps over Tanzim as well. And there is also a deeply worrying possibility that the PA may have given a green light to the demonstrations and the clashes in Arab towns within Israel so as to fan the flames not only in the territories, but also on Israeli soil.

Arab MKs played an active part in the demonstrations which took place during Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount on Thursday.

The main reason the weekend's clashes resulted in so many casualties, with some 30 Palestinians dead and hundreds injured, is that the Palestinian side was the instigator and the assailant and was sometimes blatantly careless, in terms of tactics, while the IDF forces were, in almost all of the incidents, in fortified positions and outposts.

The IDF only suffered injuries, most of them resulting from stone-throwing, even though the soldiers came under heavy fire, especially near Netzarim.

The storming of the Netzarim outpost, at the junction of the main road and the road going north into the town of Netzarim, and of the Girit outpost near the Egyptian border, were two examples of this. Three Palestinians were killed near Netzarim, though this number may not include the boy killed by automatic fire when he and his father were caught in the cross-fire.

(The Israel Defense Forces announced it is holding an investigation into who shot and killed a 12-year-old Palestinian boy. Southern Commander Maj.-Gen. Yom Tov Samia said Sunday it was still uncertain that the boy was killed by an IDF soldier. Intelligence officers are examining the video tape in an attempt to discover from what angle the boy was hit.

Even if the IDF does discover that the fatal shot was not fired by one of its men, it has hinted that it will not make a big show of this before the international media.)

The IDF was given permission to use light anti-tank fire for the first time because of the heavy fire which rained down on the Netzarim outpost. Three anti-tank missiles were fired on Palestinian positions just across the road, the suspected source of the unrelenting fire. But Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz prohibited the army from firing from fighter helicopters, despite a request from forces on the ground for such backup.

The IDF took various measures after Thursday's Temple Mount riots in preparation for a possible escalation in violence. The army initially believed that the weekend would pass relatively quietly in light of Arafat's order to demonstrate peacefully. Extra soldiers were thus placed at the most sensitive positions. Mofaz later viewed the Netzarim clashes from a helicopter, seeing for himself the masses of Palestinians and the exchange of fire.

Senior ranking Israeli and Palestinian security officials met in an attempt to end the clashes. The overall opinion formed after these meetings was that the PA police does not always have control over the goings-on in the territories.

One possible conclusion is that despite the relatively heavy losses on the Palestinian side, the leaders feel that they have scored points with the recent clashes, winning over international public opinion which has of late tended to believe that Israel had made the biggest effort to find a peaceful solution.

What is not clear is how Hamas, which is restrained by the PA, will react. Its leader Sheikh Yassin said after the Temple Mount clashes that this legitimizes his movement's operations against Israel.

Arafat 'not ruling out war on Israel'

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinians are keeping the option of war against Israel viable, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat declared in an interview with the Saudi daily Ukaz.

"We're prepared for all possibilities which circumstances might create," Arafat said.

Arafat told the Saudi newspaper that while the PA wants peace, it won't hesitate to engage in warfare to defend itself. "The Palestinian people have many options at their disposal," Arafat said, "and they have survived many sacrifices in their history."

Arafat's defiant tone was supplemented by harsh condemnation of Israel by leaders and commentators in Arab countries. MK Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount has been singled out in these Arab responses as the provocation which triggered the conflagration.

In Tehran, Khaled Meshal, the head of Hamas' political division, called for armed resistance to Israel. The Jerusalem issue, Meshal said, is a "call to action for all Muslims and Palestinian forces, [as well as to] Hezbollah."

Meshal called for "strikes against Zionist interests around the world," and he said that PA policemen should continue confrontations with IDF soldiers and should shoot at them. Asked whether Hamas will renew terror strikes against Israel, Meshal declared "the Palestinian people have the right to respond with all measures against Zionist aggression."

A Hamas spokesperson, Ibrahim Rusha, said that Palestinians have launched "a new jihad [holy war]."

Jordanian Prime Minister Ali Abu al-Ragheb said that violence in Jerusalem and the territories is a direct response to "provocations" perpetrated by opponents of the peace process. Al-Ragheb denounced the "ugly crime which Israeli soldiers carried out" against Muslim worshippers at Al-Aqsa.

Speaking yesterday with Arafat, Jordan's King Abdullah expressed his country's support for the Palestinians and their demands. Arafat will visit Amman today.

In Cairo, the state-affiliated newspaper Al-Aharam reported that Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak warned Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak that events of recent days will have "damaging consequences" for the peace process.

Canada sends two to Holocaust meet

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is sending two delegates to Vilnius, Lithuania to attend this week's conference on looted Holocaust-era assets.

And Canada is considering looking into whether any artworks plundered during the Third Reich found their way into Canadian museums and art galleries.

The Oct. 3 to 5 meeting, which focuses on cultural assets, is the latest in a series of international gatherings on Holocaust-era restitution.

In 1997, a conference on Nazi-looted gold was held in London, where Canadian officials presented a report which found no evidence that Nazi gold ever entered Canada.

In 1998, a meeting was held in Washington on looted art and unpaid insurance policies.

In January of this year, Stockholm hosted a meeting on Holocaust education and remembrance. The Canadian delegation was led by Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray.

This time, international experts from 39 countries are gathering to examine looted intellectual and moveable cultural property, including art, archives and religious objects d'art.

The Canadian delegation will consist of Jean-Claude Racine of the department of Canadian Heritage, and Sean Boyd, an official from the Canadian embassy in neighbouring Riga, Latvia. Canada has no diplomatic mission in Vilnius.

No Jewish communal officials from Canada will attend this conference, as opposed to previous gatherings. However, they will be fully apprised of developments, said Mark O'Neil, a spokesperson for the Canadian Heritage ministry.

O'Neil told The CJN that following the conference, Canada "quite likely will be looking at a follow-up project on looted cultural assets in this country." This, he said, "will give us an opportunity to work with museums."

O'Neil said the possibility cannot be ruled out that some art stolen from Jews in the Nazi era found their way into Canadian public collections. He said he didn't know how private art collections in Canada would be affected, if at all.

The meeting will seek:

- To implement the concluding principles of the Washington conference on Holocaust-era assets, as well as a resolution on looted Jewish cultural property passed by the Council of Europe;
- To discuss the compilation of an inventory of cultural assets looted during the Holocaust, and of their restitution to rightful owners;
- To establish legislative guidelines.

Further details of the conference's objectives are at www.vilniusforum.lt

Netanyahu won't face charges

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – In a move that could shake up Israel's political landscape, the attorney general has announced he will not bring corruption charges against former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

In a 22-page written opinion issued last Wednesday, Elyakim Rubinstein cited a "lack of sufficient evidence" to seek a trial on charges that Netanyahu took bribes during his tenure and failed to return state property after leaving office.

The decision clears the way for a possible political comeback by Netanyahu, who, along with his wife Sara, has denied any wrongdoing. Rubinstein also indicated in his decision that she, too, would not be indicted.

Netanyahu, presently on a lecture tour in the United States, had no immediate plans to return to Israel, according to his office.

Recent opinion polls indicate that Netanyahu would make a more formidable opponent to Barak than the current opposition leader, Ariel Sharon.

Sharon has indicated that he intends to fight to retain control over the Likud Party.

Rubinstein's decision came as Barak is fighting to rebuild his coalition, which suffered the defections of four parties on the eve of July's Camp David summit.

Barak, who now controls a minority of the Knesset's 120 seats, faces the possibility of a vote for new elections when legislators return from their recess at the end of October.

Rubinstein's decision not to press charges will not necessarily mark the end of the legal process.

Netanyahu's political rivals are expected to ask the High Court of Justice to demand an explanation from state prosecutors as to why charges were not pressed.

Latvia indicts Kalejs for war crimes

JERUSALEM — Nazi collaborator Konrad Kalejs has been indicted for genocide and war crimes by the government of Latvia.

Kalejs, who resides in Australia, is a former member of the Arajs Kommando, a paramilitary police unit that assisted in the murder of Latvian Jews during World War II. He also commanded a guard unit at the Salaspils concentration camp.

Kalejs has been expelled from Canada and the United States for his collaboration with Nazi forces. The Simon Wiesenthal Centre called on the Latvian government to immediately request his extradition and it has urged Australian authorities not to permit Kalejs to evade justice by fleeing the country.

At the same time, Arafat promised Barak that he will act in order to return calm on the street.

The same Israeli sources said it is clear that the Tanzim and leading members of the Palestinian security apparatus are behind many of the recent disturbances in the West Bank, both in terms of organization and execution.

The American administration, however, has laid the blame for the violence squarely on the visit of Likud Chair, MK Ariel Sharon, to the Temple Mount on Thursday.

While expressing serious concern, particularly at the violence, which Secretary of State Madeleine Albright described as "clearly undermining the peace process," the Americans took an unusually blatant position on Sharon's action.

The Likud chair yesterday rejected the accusations against him, saying that "the disturbances are part of an overall, premeditated campaign which began 10 days ago near Netzarim and spread from there to Jerusalem and Judea and Samaria.

"I am sorry about the injured on both sides. Nonetheless, it is unacceptable that every time the Palestinian demands are not met, they embark on violence," Sharon added.

The United States is now asking both sides to cease fire and show maximum restraint. A senior U.S. official said that "Israel and the Palestinians must avoid any activity which will stir up tensions in the region."

Albright telephoned Barak and Arafat during the weekend in an effort to calm the situation, and other American officials talked with Israeli and Palestinian counterparts.

Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz, speaking at a press conference on Saturday afternoon at the IDF headquarters in the West Bank settlement of Beit El, said that he believed that a ceasefire had been achieved. He said that he had spoken with the Palestinian heads of security, Jibril Rajoub and Muhammad Dahlan, and that a ceasefire was finalized to go into effect at 4 p.m.

"We still have 10 Palestinian funerals ahead of us. There is no chance the area will calm down," they said. Another ceasefire, set for 8 p.m. Sunday night, also failed to take hold.

Since the disturbances began on Thursday at the Temple Mount, the IDF has reinforced its positions in the territories and made use, for the first time, of light rockets against Palestinian Authority positions. Attack helicopters also made an appearance in the skies over Ramallah, Rafiah and Nablus.

The bloodletting began on Friday, with the murder of a Border Guard, Yossi Tabjeh, 27, by his Palestinian colleague during a mixed patrol in the border town of Qalqilyah. The second Border Guard, Madhet Yosef, 19, succumbed to his injuries near Joseph's Tomb in Nablus last night, when Palestinian Authority officers refused to allow Israeli medics to evacuate him.

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The opening shots to last weekend's bloody events began early on Friday morning, several hours prior to the riots that engulfed the Temple Mount compound and the clashes that continued to claim victims throughout the New Year holiday.

Shouting "Allah-u Akbar," a Palestinian Authority policeman shot and killed his Israeli colleague Yossi Tabjeh, 27, while on joint patrol in one of the main streets of the West Bank border town of Qalqilyah on Friday morning.

The men of the joint patrol were on a routine route through the town, on a guard mission that has been in place since Israel withdrew from a number of West Bank towns. The mixed team of Palestinian police and Israeli Border Guards drove in two jeeps through Area A, under Palestinian controlled territory.

Following a short drive, the patrol stopped for a coffee break. At the end of the short stop, Tabjeh, who commanded the Israeli team, was already in the front seat of the jeep, with two other Border Guards in the back seats. The perpetrator approached the jeep, shouted, "Allah-u Akbar," and fired a burst toward the back seat, missing the two Israeli officers in the back. He then moved to the other side of the jeep and shot Tabjeh, injuring him fatally.

Tabjeh died two hours later.

The driver of the Israeli patrol jeep was slightly injured in the shooting.

The other Palestinian officers tried to stop the shooter, but he turned the weapon at them. As they backed away, he ran into the centre of the town and turned himself over to one of the Palestinian Authority's security organizations.

Following the incident, the identity of the shooter was made known.

Na'il Suleiman is a resident of Assira Shimaliya, the town near Nablus where three IDF soldiers were killed by friendly fire in a failed Duvdevan commando operation in August. The man they were trying to capture, leading Hamas terrorist Mahmud Abu-Hanud, escaped.

Throughout the incident, the Border Guards did not fire a single shot. IDF officers were later sharply critical of this: "Whoever shoots at IDF soldiers or border guards must pay with his life," said one officer.

Senior members of the Palestinian security apparatus claimed that Suleiman was mentally disturbed. However, during his interrogation, the Palestinian police said that he murdered the Israeli officer to avenge the fact that he was beaten by Israeli Duvdevan troops during the operation in his village.

The surviving members of the Border Guards unit said there was no prior evidence to suggest that anything was wrong; the coffee break which preceded the incident went smoothly.

Yossi Tabjeh, who immigrated from Ethiopia during Operation Moses in the mid-1980s, will be buried today at the military cemetery in Ramle. Tabjeh was engaged to be married soon.

'So near, yet so far'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Winston Churchill's famous wartime phrase, "so near, yet so far," sums up the state of Israel's protracted and frustrating peace negotiations with the Palestinians. After almost a decade of on-again, off-again talks, beginning with the 1991 Madrid conference, the two sides have never been closer to an agreement. And yet, none of the central issues have been conclusively settled.

At the Camp David summit, which collapsed on July 25 after 15 days, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators broke new ground on recurring stumbling blocks such as borders, security cooperation, water resources and the status of Jerusalem.

As U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright correctly suggested, Camp David was "a watershed," given the willingness of Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat to seriously mull over incendiary topics which had previously been considered taboo.

In the end, despite Bill Clinton's best mediation efforts, the negotiations floundered over the disposition of the Temple Mount – the site of the first and second Jewish temples – and the future of some three million Palestinian refugees.

Less than two months later, in subsequent talks in New York City brokered yet again by the United States, Israel and the Palestinians tried once more to resolve their differences, but to no avail. Backed by Saudi Arabia, Morocco and Egypt, Arafat stuck to his insistence that the Palestinians must exert sovereignty in eastern Jerusalem.

In a concession to international pressure, Arafat agreed to postpone a unilateral declaration of Palestinian statehood slated for Sept. 13, the expiry date of the Oslo process.

Israeli policemen confront Arab rioters near the Temple Mount. Hundreds of people have been injured and 30 killed since Ariel Sharon's visit to the compound.

But in the days ahead, there was backsliding. Ahmed Qureia, a key Palestinian negotiator, rejected two Israeli demands to which Arafat had reportedly acceded: an Israeli settlement bloc in the West Bank incorporating 80 percent of Jewish settlers, and an Israeli military presence in the Jordan Valley for up to 20 years.

Barak, for his part, announced that Israel would not honour interim accords pertaining to further Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank, the provision of a northern safe passage route from the West Bank to the Gaza Strip, and the release of Palestinian prisoners.

As a result of these sombre developments, there was a sharp deterioration in the atmospherics. Saying that the talks were going nowhere, Barak accused Arafat of intransigence, a charge Arafat hurled back at him. Meanwhile, Arafat's senior aide, Nabil Abu Radaineh, complained that the peace process was fading fast, while Israel's acting foreign minister, Shlomo Ben-Ami, warned the Palestinians that Barak had run out of concessions.

In a bid to revitalize the talks, Arafat proposed Islamic sovereignty over the Temple Mount, while giving Israel control over the Western Wall and the Jewish Quarter in East Jerusalem. Barak promptly dismissed this compromise proposal, and Arafat scoffed at suggestions that the Temple Mount compound should be subject to "divine" sovereignty, whatever that means.

Two weeks ago, Barak floated a trial balloon for entrusting sovereignty on the Temple Mount to the permanent members of the United Nations, a promising solution Arafat has yet to embrace. Barak, rightly so, believes that the Temple Mount should not stand in the way of a final status treaty between Israel and the Palestinians.

Realizing that the issue of Jerusalem could be a deal-breaker, Barak, whose parliamentary mandate has become increasingly tenuous, now appears ready for a partial agreement. The Palestinians have ruled out that option, contending that there will be no breakthrough without Jerusalem, a position Barak once ardently championed.

Prospects for an accord seemed to have improved following Barak's upbeat meeting with Arafat on Sept. 26, their first since the Camp David summit, but immediately contracted after last week's fruitless negotiations in Washington and the eruption of violence following Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount on Sept. 28.

So, with the deadlock persisting, the two sides await another bridging proposal from the U.S. Yet, as Barak has said, there is still only a 50/50 chance for an agreement.

Chances of an accord may have receded even further into the distance after 30 Arabs and Jews were killed in eastern Jerusalem, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in five days of rioting. The fighting , the worst since September 1996, spilled ominously into Nazareth, Jaffa and a number of Israeli Arab villages, stunning and disheartening Israeli officials.

On the West Bank and in Gaza, Israeli soldiers and members of the Palestinian Authority's police force participated in the clashes, which injured hundreds of persons. In some instances, much to the outrage of the Palestinian leadership, Israel used helicopter gunships and anti-tank rockets to quell the demonstrations.

It was a terrible week for the wobbly peace process.

The battle to defend a textbook

By YORAM HAZONY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In the Aug. 25 issue of Ha'aretz, Akiva Eldar reported on the flurry of activity initiated by Prof. Israel Bartal in the ministries of education and foreign affairs. Eldar termed the activities "a war against a book [called] The Jewish State: The Struggle for Israel's Soul by Dr. Yoram Hazony."

But this description is not accurate. In fact, the materials being sent out in all directions hardly mention my book, and are actually part of a war to defend one book – the Education Ministry's new ninth-grade history textbook, A World of Changes (1999). The textbook was written by a staff headed by Danny Ya'akobi who was advised by a group of academics, including Bartal.

The problem faced by Bartal and his partners in this struggle is this: How do you defend a textbook that is simply indefensible?

Comment

A World of Changes is a survey of both world and Jewish history during the 20th century which departs dramatically from what have been the accepted parameters of Zionist historiography in Israeli textbooks until now.

The book makes no mention whatsoever of Chaim Weizmann during the period that he served as the president of the Zionist Organization (1921-1946). Only a single sentence is devoted to the diplomatic activities of David Ben-Gurion prior to the establishment of the State of Israel (regarding a meeting with Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1945), and no mention is made of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising or any other act of European Jewish resistance against the Nazis.

The underground operations of the Haganah, Etzel and Lehi against the British are dismissed in under one sentence ("and acts of violence on the other hand"); and the description of the Six Day War makes no mention of the Egyptian decision to blockade the Straits of Tiran.

The book does contain a large amount of material, as it should, about Jewish life in the Diaspora, the Holocaust, the peace process and the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

What is missing is the material drawn from classic Zionist historiography – the book downplays anti-Jewish persecution in the Diaspora, except where it is associated with fascism (for example, in the Soviet Union and in the Arab states). And it is broadly disinterested in acts of Jewish heroism (the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, illegal Jewish immigration into Palestine, the struggle against the British).

Similarly, personalities who made decisive contributions to the struggle for Jewish independence and security over 50 years – Yitzhak Rabin, Moshe Dayan, Ezer Weizman, Shimon Peres, Menachem Begin – virtually do not appear in the book until the '70s and '80s, when they are discussed in the context of the peace process. Entire crucial chapters of their lives have simply been erased from memory.

Yoram Hazony

In short, the Education Ministry has produced an outrageous book, which is radically divorced from the way most Israelis understand their history. Which raises the obvious question: How did this happen?

What is going on in the Education Ministry's labyrinth of academic committees and bureaucratic departments, which bear responsibility for writing this book, providing academic supervision for it, approving it, and publishing it with the logo of the Education Ministry's Curriculum Development Division?

In the case of A World of Changes, this system has failed resoundingly.

The fact that the Education Ministry could write and publish a book like this could be understood as the result of some combination of post-nationalist ideology with professional negligence. But how to explain what we've been seeing in recent weeks?

Instead of correcting the situation with a promise to publish a "corrected edition" and quietly taking the book off the shelves, government officials are lining up to join the struggle to defend this dreadful textbook.

The Education Ministry's Web site now features a 6,000-word essay by Bartal – a senior scholar who is one of the leading figures on the Education Ministry's curriculum committee – dedicated almost entirely to trying to persuade us that there is nothing wrong with this book, and that every word against it is "a lie."

But this cannot be done, and the effort leads Bartal to offer us "explanations" that are not worthy of an academic of his standing. For example, in order to deflect my claim that the book makes no mention whatsoever of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, Bartal answers that Hazony "forgot ... that on page 132 the student learns at length about recruitment of tens of thousands of Jewish volunteers for the war against the Nazis." True, there is such a description on page 132 – but what it is describing is the recruitment of Palestinian Jews into the British Army during the war.

What kind of an answer is this to the argument that the book makes no mention of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising?

Bartal offers an answer of similar quality to my claim that in A World of Changes, crucial elements of the story of the Six Day War have completely disappeared – including the Egyptian blockade of Eilat, the Israeli appeal to the Jordanians not to enter the war and the heroic battles over Jerusalem ending at the Western Wall.

The dramatic photograph of Yitzhak Rabin, Moshe Dayan and Uzi Narkis entering the Old City through the Lions' Gate is gone as well, and in its place there is a photograph of an Israeli half-track in east Jerusalem under a sign in Arabic.

I remember with love my precious
BETTY GELLER-BLISS ז"ל on the Second Memorial Anniversary
19th Tishrei — October 18

Many times I've needed you.
Many times I've cried.
If love could have saved you,
you never would have died.
In life you were loved dearly in death you are loved still.
In my heart you hold a place no one else can fill.
It broke my heart to lose you.
But you didn't go alone for part of me went with you, the day
God took you away.
The time will come when,
we will meet again.
"Remembering you with love"

Fun short stories teach morals

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One of the enjoyable things about this holiday season is that we have time to read, not just stuff we have to read for school, but books we can simply enjoy.

Gershon Kranzler has written a book of short stories, some based on chassidic legends, some on stories from the Torah, and others that are just good stories – but always with some kind of a moral behind them.

The book is Chanan and His Violin and other stories, (Merkos L'Inyonei Chinuch, 770 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, N.Y.) and has illustrations by Bryna Waldman.

The title story, Chanan and His Violin, is very moving. Chanan, a young boy in Lodz, Poland, has a wonderful talent – he plays the violin beautifully. When the Nazis invade Poland, Chanan's music helps raise the spirits and sooth the souls of the oppressed Jews in the Warsaw Ghetto, and later at the Treblinka concentration camp. Although the story does not have a happy ending, it shows that courage and strength don't come only from the barrel of a gun.

Most of the stories are far more cheerful. One is about Sender, a very poor man, who loves to recite the Psalms. His wife, desperate because there is no money to prepare for the holidays, throws an old lulav at him, and orders him to go and earn some money. Sender goes to a far city, where the king's son is very ill. The only thing that can save him is the fruit of a palm tree. And what is a lulav if not a branch of a palm tree?

In another story, a teacher who has spent his whole life either studying or teaching, discovers the miracles of nature. Still another is about an airman during World War II who is shot down by German aircraft and then works with the partisans who saved him.

You will especially enjoy stories in which people use intelligence and insight to win over those who are trying to trick or cheat.

In one story, a young boy discovers who really owns a bag of gold coins.

My favourite, though, is called The Clever Tanner. King Solomon, the wise king who built the Temple in Jerusalem, goes for a walk with three of his advisors. He has a conversation with a tanner washing skins in a river that seems to make no sense at all. The final question he asks the tanner is what he would do if the king sent him three turkeys. The tanner replies that he would pluck them. Guess who the three turkeys are!

There is even a Pesach play that you might enjoy putting on before the seder.

Singer, actress Theresa Tova releases debut CD

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

STRATFORD — Theresa Tova, the jazzy singer for whom Yiddish is "a state of mind" has had harsher times in her career.

The actor, who plays matchmaker Yenta in the much praised production of Fiddler on the Roof here, remembers when she was mopping the floor backstage before the opening curtain of Still the Night at Toronto's Theatre Passe Muraille – a play in which she starred.

She has come a long way since, playing the role of anarchist Emma Goldman in the musical Ragtime in Washington in a 2,000 seat venue. At that time, U.S. Vice-President Al Gore told her "there were a lot of unionists out there who liked what you did."

On that trip, the Canadian ambassador to Washington allowed Tova's children, Tara, 14, and David, 16, to sit in his chair and pretend they were running things. Her children, incidentally, spent most of the summer at Stratford with her. Her husband Bob Pearson, a professional costume and set designer, joined them on weekends.

Her debut CD, Telling Stories, is being sold at an aboriginal art gallery in Stratford, and the irrepressible Tova told the woman curator, "Don't be surprised if members of my tribe show up."

Tova recalls the time she was travelling in a 17-passenger van with her musicians to give a concert in Windsor arranged by a prominent philanthropist, when the van's radiator blew near a gas station with a coffee house.

While the group waited for a fleet of four vans to pick them up, Tova had her hair done and applied makeup in the washroom. They arrived just in the nick of time for the concert.

On Oct. 31, just three days before Fiddler ends its run, Tova will rush into Toronto to appear at the Leah Posluns Theatre in a concert fund-raiser for the Shtetl Foundation of Canada (an organization set up to raise money for the building of a scale replica of a Lithuanian shtetl).

These types of deadlines are now old hat for the singer who was born in Paris but came to Calgary at the age of 18 months. She learned Yiddish as her first language in the prairies, where her grandparents and parents spoke to her only in Yiddish.

"Why do you act surprised?" the student asked.

"Because," Tova replied, "you are not 65 and you aren't Jewish."

The singer, in fact, is surprised at how many non-Jews are buying the record, which, she says, is 80 percent in Yiddish.

Theresa Tova

Her close friend and mentor, Hindy Nosek-Abelson, wrote the Yiddish translation for the popular depression song, Brother Can You Spare a Dime? which illustrates the diversity of the CD.

The CD produced by cafe singer John Alcorn has a jazzy edge to it, and includes Sheyn Vi Di Levone, Leybeke, Tell Me, Where Should I Go?, Harshil, Oygen, Papirosen, Play a Little Song for me (in Yiddish), Under Your White Starry Heaven, and Abi Gezint.

Tova is rehearsing for her one-night concert at the George Weston Recital Hall, Toronto Centre for the Arts (formerly the Ford Centre), Nov. 19, with her sextet of five-star musicians. She will sing numbers in Yiddish and English.

The Waletzky Trio from New York will open for her in their Toronto debut. The Waletzky Trio is known for their sensitive interpretation of Yiddish melodies and candid lyrics. Tickets, $40, $33, $25, are available from Ticketmaster 416-870-8000.

Arts & Travel

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

PEOPLE OF THE BOOK

As we turn the page into the New Year of 5761, Eye On Arts presents its annual survey of what some people in the arts and literary community are reading.

Anne Frank: The Biography, by Melissa Müller, has been claiming the recent attention of Chava Rosenfarb, the Toronto-based Holocaust author. The book, published in 1999 by Henry Holt, contains an epilogue by Miep Gies.

"It gives a lot of information about Europe before the war," says Rosenfarb. "It may not be the greatest biography because Anne was so young, and I like more character analysis in a book. But it has a lot of information about how the Dutch people behaved during the war."

Rosenfarb is author of the Yiddish novels Bociany and Of Lodz and Love, which the Syracuse University Press brought out in English translation last year. The books were awarded the national Glassco Prize for translation in Ottawa on Sept. 30.

Speaking of Anne Frank, writer-director Al Waxman (whose autobiography, That's What I Am, appeared last year) says he read everything he could find about Frank as he prepared to direct The Diary of Anne Frank at Stratford this season. He seldom has time to read things unconnected to his current dramatic projects for TV or movies, he says.

However, in connection with an hour-long documentary on Montreal Jewish poet A.M. Klein, Waxman recently read some of Klein's poetry and began reading his novel, The Second Scroll.

"I had heard Klein's name before, but I didn't know a great deal about him," Waxman admits. "Now I know who he is and what he wrote, and I have the opportunity of turning other people onto him. He's one of those Canadians who are more famous in the United States than in Canada. I like the idea of celebrating accomplished Canadians."

Produced by the History Channel, the documentary about Klein is called The Messiah of Montreal. In it, Leonard Cohen reads a poem he wrote about Klein, Margaret Atwood reads some of his poetry, and Waxman narrates as he strolls the poet's former neighbourhoods. The hour-long production, Waxman says, will air in the winter.

Nomi Berger, author of seven novels in the 1980s and the more recent non-fiction book My Brother Peter, is currently reading A Good House, by Bonnie Burnard, winner of the 1999 Giller Prize.

"It's a very meticulously detailed study of a family and small-town Ontario life from 1949 to 1997," Berger says. "It's very well-crafted and has a remarkable ring of authenticity. It's a charming read."

'Bellow has lost none of his talent'

In his novel Ravelstein, Saul Bellow focuses on a character based on his late friend, Allan Bloom, the Chicago professor who once taught in Toronto. Author Morley Torgov (The War to End All Wars, The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick) says he found Ravelstein particularly intriguing because his children studied with Bloom years ago. "My children were almost his disciples," he recalls.

"Even though Bellow is 85 years old, he's lost none of his talent or genius as a writer. He's as great as ever." Torgov also read The Human Stain, Philip Roth's latest. "The guy simply can't write a bad book," he says.

Having just completed the writing of Stickler and Me, a young adult novel that is now at a publishing house, Torgov has started working on a new novel, Suicide Note, about the composer Robert Schumann.

Barbara Rusch, chair of the upcoming Holocaust Education Week, holds a master's degree in French literature. She recently read Pamela, by Samuel Richardson, an early classic of English literature. Published in 1740 and regarded as the first modern novel, it's an epistolary tale (told in a series of letters) about a woman who, being of sound virtue, triumphs over an abductor who presses her for favours.

"I was very impressed that this innocent woman was not rescued from her fate by a deus ex machina or by a man coming in on a white charger," Rusch says. "Rather, she was rescued by her own virtue, her own quick thinking, her incredibly strong family values, and her own determination."

Filmmaker, author Amos Kollek feels 'conflict' living outside Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israeli film director Amos Kollek, the son of Jerusalem's former mayor, is torn between desire and duty.

"Everyone should do what they want," he said, "and that includes the freedom to live where they want to live. But I was raised on Zionism and all that. So a certain conflict exists in my being away from Israel."

Kollek, whose movie, Fast Food Fast Women, was screened at the recently-concluded Toronto International Film Festival, is a resident of New York City when he is not living in Jerusalem.

But his famous father, Teddy, who was mayor of Israel's capital for a quarter of a century, would be far happier if he returned to Israel on a permanent basis. "Overall, pure and simple, he would love for me to live in Israel."

Kollek, however, has no plans to move back to Jerusalem, where he maintains a house near the zoo.

"For a variety of reasons, I have a wish to be away from Israel sometimes because Israel can be very confining. And sometimes, you have a wish to go against what people tell you. I have a certain resistance to being told what to do."

A bit of a rebel, Kollek, 53, believes that, as a filmmaker, he is better off in the United States. He lives there with his third wife, Osnat, a photographer, and their two young children, Avigaiyeel, 5, and Noaa, 3.

"To some degree, it's easier to shoot a film outside Israel," said Kollek, a mild-mannered, balding man with wispy gray hair whose low-budget English-language films invariably touch on such themes as loneliness and the search for love.

"There is little funding for films in Israel. Making independent movies anywhere is hard, but still harder in Israel. And statistically, films have a better chance of distribution abroad."

And yet, because he is an Israeli to the marrow, Kollek usually tries to find ways to connect his films to Israel. "I'm an Israeli and I have emotional ties to Israel. It's basically my home."

Kollek's first movie, Goodbye, New York, was shot in Israel. A subsequent film, Double Edge, dealt with the Arab-Israeli dispute. And the film he is currently working on, Linda, a comedy about relationships, is partially set in and around Jerusalem.

Born in Jerusalem in 1947, he studied psychology and philosophy at the Hebrew University after serving in the army. (Kollek's younger sister, Osnat Sachs, a painter, lives in Israel).

In his second year as a student, he wrote a movie treatment which blossomed into a novel, and a movie called Don't Ask Me If I Love, and effectively launched his overlapping careers as a novelist and filmmaker.

"My parents were very supportive, though they would have preferred me to be a farmer on a kibbutz, building the country. But it was never a major issue between us."

When he was in his 20s and 30s, Kollek concentrated on writing, churning out a succession of novels from The Girl Who Brought The War to Four Weeks In Gaza. He also contributed columns to Ma'ariv, the Tel Aviv daily, and La Isha, a women's magazine.

In 1979, he turned his talents to his autobiography, For Jerusalem: A Life, published in Hebrew, English and other languages.

"I guess he asked me to work with him because he wanted to get to know me better," Kollek explained in an interview on the second-last day of the Toronto International Film Festival. "When I was growing up, he was very busy with affairs of state."

Around 1985, Kollek began to focus on cinema. "I haven't written a novel in about five years," he said.

Kollek, whose independent, non-studio films include Forever Lulu, High Stakes, Sue and Fiona, has worked with actors from Hanna Schygulla and Sally Kirkland to Alec Baldwin and Faye Dunaway.

His films, usually financed by European investors and made for under $2 million U.S., are not great moneymakers.

But in the past three years, they have gained greater recognition than ever before. Fast Food Fast Women, his third movie at Toronto's festival, revolves around an overworked Manhattan waitress who's been stuck in a stale relationship for too long. It opened to good reviews in Israel and France, and will be released in the United States next spring.

Politically, he and his father are more or less on the same wavelength, both being Labour party pragmatists.

The eastern sector of Jerusalem, he observed, will eventually have to be shared by Israel and the Palestinians. "It's not important who officially controls eastern Jerusalem, but how well people get along. Why die over all kinds of arguments over this or that piece of land? As long as one side is deeply unhappy, there won't be peace."

"It's not an existential issue. It's a technical issue that should be solved."

Ex Argo cheerleader does the cha-cha in Grease

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Maureen Katz says her daughter Jodie could sing before she could talk.

At her first birthday party, the budding chanteuse took delight in entertaining all her guests. Now 25, the Ottawa-born actress, singer and dancer's passion for performing is still very evident in her portrayal of Cha-Cha in the latest production of the hit Broadway musical and Hollywood movie, Grease, Like You've Never Seen It!

As Cha-Cha, a sly, saucy and sassy girl who loves to dance, Katz joins leads Ma-Anne Dionisio (Miss Saigon) as Sandy, and Rick Miller as Danny, in this updated revival of the classic '50s-inspired musical.

Katz is a natural talent, born into a musical family. Her father was in a band a few decades ago and her mother played the clarinet.

"When it comes to musicality, I can't read a note of music; it is like Greek to me," Katz says. "I have had almost no vocal training, but I have a very good ear. I don't know how to play any instruments, but I hear everything with almost perfect tone.

"My training in dancing is quite sparse. I went to the Gretta Leeman School of Dance in Ottawa and studied jazz just until I was 13, but I've always been this firecracker dancer. I'm very fortunate to have this talent in me.

"In terms of my training, I've been almost all self-taught, which can be a hindrance at certain auditions that are very technical," she admits. "I muddle through and I've gone pretty far, considering."

Her first foray into theatre was in Fiddler on the Roof for the JCC Theatreworks in Ottawa.

Katz attended McGill University in Montreal graduating with a degree in North American studies. At McGill, she kept active writing for the school paper, cheerleading and appearing in musicals.

Her first big role at the University was Val in A Chorus Line. When Canada's Wonderland held auditions across the country, 300 hopefuls attended the audition in Montreal alone.

Jodie Katz

She followed her summer job at Canada's Wonderland with the UC Follies production of Guys and Dolls at Hart House.

In March 1998, she landed a job performing as lead singer on a cruise line travelling around the Caribbean and the Mediterranean.

Since coming to Toronto, Katz has taken a few classes at the Randolph Dance School and some private vocal coaching with David Dunbar.

"Singing, dancing and acting isn't just a hobby, it is my other persona. It is not something, I chose to do – it has chosen me.

"In that sense, I feel blessed not only to perform for an audience, but actually make it my living.

"I have to make it work or my mom will make me go back to school, which I really don't mind – I love school."

To support her budding career, Katz works at a number of jobs including as a journalist for a Web site company geared to students, as a go-go dancer at the Phoenix and the Joker (two night-clubs in the city), and as an occasional wedding singer.

Like many other actors, she too wants to tackle Broadway one day.

"I'm very emotional and sensitive, like most actors tend to be. When I go to see a big musical, I actually cry because I want to be on that stage so badly that it hurts.

"This year, a really telling moment for me was when I was watching the Tony Awards and I started to bawl, because I had just gotten the part of Cha-Cha in Grease, which was a big deal to me.

"At that moment, I knew in four months I wouldn't have to be watching from the audience. I would be onstage. It was an overwhelming feeling," she says.

Grease, Like You've Never Seen It! is directed by Denis Bouchard and choreographed by Dominque Giraldeau, both of Montreal, and is playing at Toronto's Elgin Theatre until Oct. 22. For tickets, call the Elgin Theatre Box Office at 416-872-5555.

Aelita glitters in BJC fundraiser

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Latvian-born singer Aelita linked arms with Igor Emelianov, her baritone supporting star, and turned to the sold-out audience at Leah Posluns Theatre.

"How many of you think we are married?" she asked teasingly.

Half the audience put up their hands, and Aelita replied: "Yes we are, but not to each other. My husband is doing the lights for the show, so I have to be nice to him."

This was typical of the tone set by the international starlet in her first professional appearance at the theatre, where her production, Around the World in 90 minutes, was a fund-raiser for the 55 plus department of Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC).

Aelita, appearing in glittering gowns,which she said she was willing to lend to any one of appropriate size (size 4 to 6), said she has raised $7 million for Israel in 20 years.

In addition to Emelianov, her show included energetic violinist Vassily Popadiuk and six dancers from the Ontario Dance Theatre Company whose numbers took the audience to world capitals.

Aelita was at her best as chanteuse Edith Piaf, dressed in an appropriate French costume, singing La Vie en Rose, but her sing-along numbers in Yiddish were the most popular with the audience.

The audience was welcomed by BJC officers Ed Yuditsky, Ida Gross and Joe Starr, who all paid tribute to staff members Teme Kernerman, Janet Klein-Slavin and Janis Roth.

A brief history of Jewish film making

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The High Holy Days are usually a time of reflection and contemplation and with this in mind, my thoughts recently turned to the great advances that have been made in putting Jewish stories and Jewish characters on the silver screen.

The sound era in films started with a bang. The first talkie was The Jazz Singer, a story about a cantor's son who leaves his Jewish traditions to pursue success as a popular entertainer.

After that very little of Jewish content came to the screen for many years. Most of the 1930s, 1940s and early 1950s, the era of Hollywood's Golden Age, saw few Jews portrayed in films.

If one excludes the two dozen or so Yiddish films produced during these two decades, there is very little Jewish content produced in the film world, with the possible exception of Charlie Chaplin's The Great Dictator and Ernst Lubitsch's To Be Or Not To Be.

There were a few films that dealt with Jewish characters, such as Disraeli, The Rothschilds, The Jolson Story and Rhapsody In Blue, but most of these had their Jewish characteristics filtered out.

Once these films got by the perfunctory childhood years, there was very little reference to the characters' Jewishness.

Even after two of the most momentous events in Jewish and world history, the Holocaust and the re-establishment of an independent Jewish state, the people who controlled the film industry were too paranoid to deal with these subjects on the screen.

Actually, I am speaking too broadly. There were a handful of Jewish films made in the 1940s and early 1950s, but these were done mainly by small studios and often by non-Jewish producers and directors.

Orson Welles directed and starred in a small, but powerful film about an escaped Nazi war criminal called The Stranger in 1946, and Elia Kazan directed the landmark Gentleman's Agreement in 1947.

Kazan was inundated by Hollywood moguls in an attempt to dissuade him from making the film, but refused to acquiesce to their pleas.

The year 1947 also saw the release of the film Crossfire, with Edward Dmytryk directing this powerful look at anti-Semitism.

Several small films about Israel, or set in Israel, were also made during this period, such as Kirk Douglas' The Juggler, Sword In The Desert and Faithful City, but once again, these films did not receive much studio support and they disappeared very quickly.

Woody Allen

Even the advent of home video has been unable to resuscitate these last three films and they are still unavailable to film collectors unless you are fortunate enough to come across them during some late night television presentation.

The late 1950s and early 1960s saw the first signs that change was coming to Hollywood. The old producers and movie moguls were disappearing and a new generation was taking control of the film industry. Some of the old fears disappeared and some new approaches revitalized the business, especially after Hollywood made peace with the television industry.

It now became a little easier to produce films about Jews and about Jewish events. Such films as Marjorie Morningstar, Me and the Colonel, The Diary of Anne Frank, Exodus, Judgment At Nuremberg and The Pawnbroker came to the screen during the late 1950s and 1960s.

Although the taboo had finally been broken, it would still be some time before Hollywood became comfortable about showing Jewish characters on screen.

It would require the appearance of producers/directors such as Mel Brooks, Woody Allen, Paul Mazursky and Barry Levinson to open the doors all the way.

After that, others could follow and by the end of the 1990s, filmmakers finally seemed more at ease in putting Jewish characters on screen, even when it was completely irrelevant to the plot, in such films such as Independence Day and Boiler Room.

As a result, the past two years have seen such widely released feature films as A Walk On The Moon, Life Is Beautiful, Jakob The Liar, Liberty Heights and Keeping The Faith. Not all of these have been successful at the box office, but it is a trend that appears to be ongoing.

In fact, several films with Jewish themes or major Jewish characters are scheduled for release over the next year or two and a number of television films and mini-series are scheduled to be telecast.

If this is an area of interest for you, keep you eyes on the film release schedules, film festival programs and television guides, because there are some interesting, provocative and stimulating films on the horizon.

Travel professionals raising funds for medical research

TORONTO — Conquest Vacations, a leading Canadian tour wholesaler, is helping to raise funds to support research into Ehlers-Danlos Syndrome (EDS), a relatively little-known medical disorder that weakens the connective tissues of the skin, ligaments, tendons and blood vessels.

The disorder is congenitive and affects one in every 5,000 to 10,000 persons of all racial and ethnic backgrounds, both males and females.

The condition affects children and may, in extreme cases, result in organ and vessel rupture, immobility, and shortened life expectancy.

Conquest, which operates charter travel packages from major Canadian cities to popular sun destinations in Florida, Mexico and the Caribbean, as well as offering flights to Europe, handles about one million passengers per year. The Toronto-based company recently printed 150,000 donation flyers about EDS, which it is enclosing in all of its ticket packages in Ontario throughout the late summer and fall.

"We're telling our customers something about EDS, and we're saying, 'You're going on a vacation and you obviously have some disposable income, and can you spare a few bucks to help,'" says Robbie Goldberg, president and owner of the 28-year-old company. "We hope we can do some good."

The donations are being used to support research into the disease being conducted at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto.

Conquest, which has supported other fundraising efforts of the Hospital for Sick Children, was spurred into action in this case by an industry colleague, travel consultant David Freudmann of Uniworld Travel and Tours. Freudmann has been actively campaigning for EDS for some time.

"What I want to do eventually is to establish a chair of research for EDS, but that costs $2 million," Freudmann says. "We're building up to the chair with an endowed research fund. That's the route we've taken. We have about 50 per cent in actual pledges so far."

According to Conquest's flyer, researchers have identified the genetic codes that produce EDS, but "There are still many more questions about diagnosis, classification, and treatment which go unanswered."

For more information about the EDS Research Endowment Fund, contact the Hospital for Sick Children at 416-813-6166; fax 416-813-5024.

Broadcast vet on the move with new Web venture

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Riding the crest of the Internet craze, a development no less sweeping in scope than the 19th-century Industrial Revolution, he is refining a concept bound to insinuate itself into the lives of millions of people around the world within the next few years.

With the launch of their Toronto-based dotcom company last January, Cohen and his partner, Chris Meraw, have begun to develop a new kind of broadcasting for the 21st century.

Never having been intimidated by the fast pace of technological change, he is pressing ahead, confident that he and Meraw are in the right place, at the right time.

"I've always believed in the next big thing," said Cohen, who was surfing the Internet long before it morphed into a household name-cum-convenience in the 1990s. "As the Internet grew, I grew with it."

Cohen's Internet station, www.tvradio.com, offers viewers in more than 100 countries, including Israel, a panoply of original "infotainment" programming.

His Internet television portal can best be accessed with a high-speed cable connection using Internet Explorer and Windows Media Player, he said.

Offering close to 40 hours of original, "need-driven" content, in shows of duration from two to five minutes, tvradio.com is nothing if not eclectic.

Through the medium of some 21 specialty networks, surfers can log on to programs on topics running the gamut from health, food and drink to film and business.

The programming is useful and user-friendly, said Cohen, a 52-year-old veteran broadcaster born and raised in Montreal.

If you click on the movie network, you can read the latest film reviews, celebrity interviews and behind-the-scenes accounts of how movies are made.

Click on the doctors' or health networks and you can call up information on subjects ranging from erectile dysfunction to holistic medicine.

Click on Private Eye and you can learn how to hire a private detective and where to buy spy gadgets.

Click on comedy and you'll be told what it takes to be a comedian.

"We have a growing audience," said Cohen, estimating that Americans comprise 70 percent of his viewers, while Canadians account for 15 to 20 percent.

"Anyone can log on and do what they want with us," he added.

Currently in the process of going public, Virtual Broadcast Corp. intends to generate revenue through advertising, e-commerce and technology transfer.

Although it is still fairly new, the company already has managed to snag blue-chip advertisers like Mercedes Benz, Avis and Via Rail.

Its e-commerce arm, which will be up and running soon, has signed distributorships with music, video and beauty products firms.

Cohen, a seasoned TV producer and director who has worked for Canada's two major networks, CTV and CBC, joined Virtual Broadcast Corp. in June 1999.

"Meraw reached out to me via a mutual friend," he explained. "I shared his vision and was excited by his dream. Fifteen minutes into our first meeting, I pulled out my cheque-book. We have clicked along famously since."

From not a single employee a year ago, the company has grown to 20 full-time workers and 10 freelancers today.

"We've passed the research-and-development phase, and now large investors are coming our way," Cohen said.

A graduate of Montreal's Northmount High School, he is the son of Edward and Beatrice Cohen. They met as soldiers in London during World War II and recently celebrated their 80th birthdays.

In fact, Cohen was first bitten by the show business bug when he was much younger. At Camp B'nai Brith, in the Laurentians, he and a group of campers appeared on a CKVL radio show. The experience brought out his innate qualities as a trouper.

Sidney M. Cohen

After finishing high school, he studied computer programming and toiled at a number of forgettable jobs.

University never beckoned. "I was too busy working," he said.

The peripatetic Cohen then directed news coverage for TV stations in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto – CFCF, CJOH and CFTO.

Building his resume, he directed three CBC-TV programs – Midday, Business World and Newsworld. As executive producer of CTV's Canada AM, he directed live coverage of the 1992 summer Olympics in Barcelona, Spain.

It was a hectic, stimulating life. One day, he recalled, he had breakfast with Shimon Peres and lunch with Mikhail Gorbachev.

Cohen, who is married and has two grown children, was also involved in the creation of several Canadian game shows.

The Mad Dash, which ran from 1979 to 1985, was the first big-prize game show in this country, he claimed. Now being made in a Polish-language version in Lodz, it was the first English-Canadian series to be licensed and produced abroad.

From 1981 to 1988, Cohen co-created and directed a prime-time series, Thrill Of A Lifetime.

Cohen also produced Alex Trebek's early CBC series, Strategy, and produced and directed Time Chase, a quiz show in association with History Television.

Of late, he has been putting the finishing touches to Porthole TV, a show about cruise ships which debuts on Global in mid-October.

For now, however, Cohen's energies are primarily focused on tvradio.com. "We'll be big," he said. "We're developing partnerships. We're moving into foreign languages."

Cohen and company are doubtless on the move.

Israel among world leaders in bioengineering

By WENDY ELLIMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The formal birth of bioengineering – the blending of mechanical, electrical and chemical engineering with medicine and biology – roughly coincided with that of the State of Israel.

Artificial organs, prosthetic limbs, cardiac pacemakers, hearing aids, space suits and cosmetic implants are the products of a science barely known 50 years ago.

Surgery is one area where bioengineering is leading to great improvements. An idea being tested at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa, for example, is a surgical robot whose "hand" is much steadier than a surgeon's.

With the correct co-ordinates fed in, this tremor-less mechanical hand performs knee-replacement surgery with superhuman accuracy, says project developer Prof. Moshe Shoham.

Image-guided surgery is another bioengineering technique that bestows on surgeons superhuman precision. With special scanners and CT or magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), it can pinpoint areas of the brain to within a fraction of a millimetre, adds Shoham.

In another example, last year at Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Centre in Jerusalem, Prof. Felix Umansky, a neurosurgeon, was able to remove a bullet from the head of an 11-year-old boy along the exact trajectory it had travelled upon entry, sparing the child additional trauma to his brain tissue.

Coupled with a radiation device, this exact way of localizing targets inside critically sensitive tissue can deliver radiotherapy to specific groups of brain cells to control epilepsy or Parkinson's tremors, insert an electrode and, ultimately, transplant healthy brain cells.

On a larger scale, movement of human arms is being measured in mathematical terms at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, where Prof. Tamar Flash has found that the brain always chooses the smoothest possible movements. "Understanding how the brain controls arm movements is of great relevance to robotics," she explains.

Her collaborative work with engineers and other researchers has already had an effect on robot design in agriculture, for example. A robot equipped with artificial vision is used for harvesting melons.

The algorithms derived from Flash's studies about the way the brain directs the arm to reach for and grasp an object is being applied to the "arms" designed for medical robots.

Science's growing understanding of genetics has clearly had a domino effect in the bioengineering field – and its effects are not limited to medicine.

A Ben-Gurion University of the Negev research project to decipher the genetic code of red algae may lead to growing fruits, vegetables and grains in the ocean. Among the thousands of genes professors Shoshana Arad and Yakov Weinstein hope to find are those that will permit growth in seawater. It may be possible to isolate these genes, and then transplant them into food crops which can be "sown" in the world's oceans.

Marine life is at the centre of another promising bioengineering study at Ben-Gurion. Biologists, chemists and physicians there are investigating the usage of biomaterials from the sea to replace human bone damaged by trauma or disease.

The researchers have found a strong and porous coral that doesn't trigger an attack by the human immune system, and degrades as new bone grows. They are also growing coral-like materials in laboratories and returning them to the sea to ensure the long-term health of coral reefs.

Genetics is also playing an ever-increasing role in medicine. In cancers of the bladder, ovary and liver, for example, Hadassah researchers have found a correlation between the progress of the disease and the levels of the H19 gene in the patient.

"Ultimately, H19, along with every gene involved in tumour development, could be screened through [a process called] DNA array," says Dr. Eithan Galun. "Medicines could then be tailored for the gene expression unique to the tumour in each patient."

Meanwhile, the DNA of malignant tumours is under attack at Ben-Gurion, where a team of researchers is working on techniques that could significantly improve treatment for certain cancers. Their focus is prostate cancer, and their technique involves the placement of tiny radioactive sources directly into the prostate.

The team uses a drug they've developed, called porphyrin, which is drawn to tumorous cells. When activated, the drug releases low-energy electrons into the cells, devastating their DNA, while sparing the healthy tissues surrounding the tumour.

Genetic engineering technology may also defeat autoimmune diseases such as multiple sclerosis and rheumatoid arthritis. A Technion team led by Dr. Nathan Karin has created what it calls a "naked DNA vaccination," which "teaches" the immune system to correct its own errors.

The team created specially engineered genes based on the patient's own peptides, the overproduction of which can result in devastating inflammation of nerves, joints and cartilage. These new genes deceive the immune system into decreasing peptide production.

However, one major stumbling block in gene therapy is getting the right gene to the right place. While no method of delivery has yet been perfected, a Hadassah team has developed a way of testing whether hard-to-see DNA reaches the right organ or tissue.

"We've borrowed from the firefly," explains Galun. "The light it emits is based on a single gene, which we add to each gene package sent into mice. When we scan the mouse, the firefly gene glows, and we can see which tissues the gene package has reached."

The short history of bioengineering is one of rapid progress. With Israeli scientists, in part, taking an active lead, it has succeeded in bypassing the heart, replacing human organs and producing detailed and accurate images of the insides not only of our bodies, but even of our cells.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. What would be the best foods to serve Kol Nidre night, before fasting?

A. Your best choices would be a combination of protein and complex carbohydrates. The protein could be any meat, fish or poultry. The complex carbohydrates could be minestrone soup or barley soup, or dishes such as brown rice, kasha, lentils, split peas; complex carbohydrates for dessert could include oatmeal cookies, banana, apple or carrot cake made with whole wheat flour, and fresh fruit. Also be sure to drink a lot of fluids (particularly water) to avoid thirst, and avoid very salty or spicy foods. Have an easy fast!

Q. My son is four months old and I am wondering when it is an appropriate time to introduce cereal, which one I start with and how long until I try the next?

A. Now is a perfect time to introduce cereal. Most pediatricians recommend starting cereal between four and six months. You should start by introducing rice cereal, then barley, then oatmeal and last mixed grains. I usually recommend giving each grain for five days before trying to the next. You want to make sure that your baby is tolerating the first type before introducing another. Some parents think that giving the beginner cereals (rice and barley) for longer than five days is a safer way to ensure tolerance. You should be careful in doing this, as rice and barley cereal are both more constipating than the other grains. It is best to try them all (five days each) and then serve your baby a varied menu of grains to prevent constipation and discomfort.

Vatican decisions upset rabbis; Jewish-Christian dialogue cancelled

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Recent moves by the Vatican have soured its relations with Jews to the point where a scheduled "Day of Jewish-Christian Dialogue" is being indefinitely postponed.

Rome's chief rabbi, Elio Toaff, and his deputy, Rabbi Abramo Piattelli, pulled out of the scheduled Oct. 3 symposium – long scheduled as part of the Holy See's Millennium Holy Year program.

The rabbis were responding to two developments earlier this month that deeply upset Jews.

One was the Sept. 3 beatification of Pope Pius IX, the 19th-century pontiff who was the last pope to keep Jews in the ghetto and who was behind the 1858 kidnapping of a young Jewish boy who had been secretly baptized as a baby.

The other was a Vatican document released Sept. 5 that rejected the idea that other faiths are equal to Catholicism.

The document, issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, the Vatican's guardian of orthodoxy, said followers of other religions are "in a gravely deficient situation in comparison with those who, in the church, have the fullness of the means of salvation."

Even other Christian denominations have "defects," it said.

"There exists a single Church of Christ, which subsists in the Catholic Church, governed by the Successor of Peter and by the bishops in communion with him," it said.

The document sparked anger and dismay among Jewish and non-Catholic Christian leaders, and prompted concern that it could set back the course of interfaith dialogue that started during the 1960s with the Second Vatican Council.

To many observers, both the document and the beatification of Pius IX seemed out of step with the outreach to Jews and other faiths that has been a pillar of the papacy of Pope John Paul II.

The Pope made self-examination and repentance for past sins – including anti-Semitism – a major theme of the 2000 Jubilee, or Holy Year.

These new "pronouncements of the church are surprising and inconsistent with the courageous steps of John Paul II," Leone Paserman, president of the Rome Jewish community, told reporters.

Tullia Zevi, a former president of Italy's Jewish community, called the two developments "a cold shower after the optimism generated by the development of dialogue."

"The idea that Anglican and other churches are not 'proper churches' seems to question the considerable ecumenical gains we have made," said Archbishop of Canterbury George Carey, the spiritual leader of 70 million Anglicans, in a statement.

Some saw the developments as dramatic evidence of an inner struggle within the Vatican hierarchy as the 80-year-old John Paul's reign draws to its inevitable close.

But others saw them as consistent with Catholic theology and belief.

"It is the Roman Catholic formula of confession, extended to behaviour," said one Rome observer. "The assumption is that you apologize, ask forgiveness, and the slate is wiped clean."

Boxing legend was Canadian welterweight champion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Back in the Dirty '30s, Sammy Luftspring was a man to be reckoned with. Like many of his contemporaries who grew up in the Ward, the Jewish area of downtown Toronto, he was a fighter, spurred on by hard times and widespread discrimination to meet society's challenges with his fists.

Luftspring went his contemporaries one better. He rode his pugilistic skills to international acclaim and to the top of his sport at a time when hundreds if not thousands of fighters vied for national and world titles.

Luftspring, 84, died last week after a lengthy illness.

One of nine children, Luftspring got into boxing as a teenager. His first fight took place in the Brunswick Talmud Torah auditorium, according to his brother Syd. Although boxing was a popular sport of the day, "my mother hated it with a passion ... My father did not mind it much," he said.

Sammy moved up through the ranks pretty quickly. In the 1930s he was a holy terror, scrapping regularly in prize fights and felling just about everyone who stood in his way.

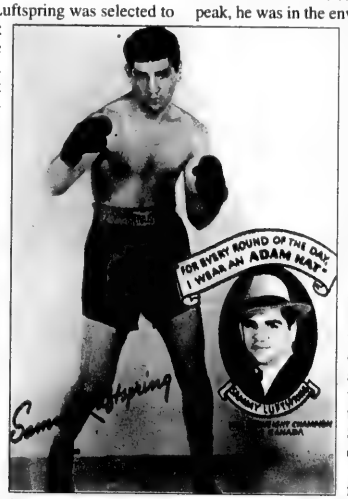
As an amateur, Luftspring was selected to represent Canada at the 1936 Olympic Games in Germany. But his father did not want Sammy to participate in the "Nazi Games," so the fighter declined the invitation, Syd recalled.

Instead, Luftspring, along with Norman "Baby" Yack, chose to participate in an alternate games in Barcelona. But when they reached the port city of Dieppe, France, they learned the Barcelona games were cancelled because of the Spanish Revolution.



Later that year, Luftspring turned professional and in 1938, at age 22, he won the Canadian Welterweight title by defeating Frankie Genovese in the first 15-round bout ever held in Ontario.

He held the title for two years and at his peak, he was in the enviable position of being third in line for a shot at world champion Henry Armstrong. That's when bad luck befell him.

In a fight against Steve Balloise at Madison Square Garden, he took a thumb in the eye. Although the injury took place in the second round of a 10-round fight, Luftspring refused to quit and finished the match even though he couldn't see out of the eye. He lost a split decision but what was worse, he lost the vision in the eye. Surgery could not correct the damage.

Luftspring, who fought with a Star of David on his trunks, turned to refereeing, amassing a career total of more than 2,000 fights, including one world title. He was inducted into the Canadian Sports Hall of Fame in 1985.

Following his boxing career, Luftspring tried his hand at several ventures. He drove a taxi for a while and he was a representative for one of the liquor companies, Syd recalled.

In the 1940s, Luftspring, along with baseball star Harry Eckler and football hero Joe Krol, went into business together. The three amigos acquired a beer licence and opened the Mercury Club on Dundas Street near Bay.

The nightclub proved a roaring success – the "in" place to see and be seen. Not only did it attract other sportsmen and hangers-on – as well as its fair share of disreputable characters – but top entertainers from a nearly burlesque club often dropped by. Once there, and once loosened up with a few free drinks, they often agreed to entertain, Eckler said.

Henny Youngman, Vic Damone and Tony Bennett were among the stars who graced the club's stage.

Sammy would serve as emcee of the show and often sing a song or two, Eckler added.

Afterwards, the three opened the Cav-a-bob Nightclub downtown, which attempted to cash in on the Latin American craze of the early 1960s.

Luftspring is survived by his daughter Orion Feldman, son Brian Luftspring, brother Syd and sisters Freda Eisen and Jean Kaplan.

Is that 15 points for 'Scrabble'?

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Washiest" is not a word that comes up much in everyday conversation. Although it is translated as most diluted or insipid (think of wishy-washy), it's obscure enough that in the heat of a game, many Scrabble players might challenge its legitimacy.

In the world of competitive Scrabble, however, where "qintar" passes without comment, washiest is far from the rarest of words. Several years ago, Montrealer Bernard Gotlieb used "washiest" in a tournament to score 212 points, placing it at the bottom left-hand corner of the board and cashing in on two triple word scores, a double letter score and a "bingo," a 50-point bonus that occurs when a competitor uses all seven tiles in a single manoeuvre.

Two hundred and twelve points for one word – sounds like a decent game for an amateur – and it's no wonder that Gotlieb made the trek from Montreal to test his wits in the recent Michael Wise Memorial Scrabble Tournament at the Earl Bales Community Centre.

Sponsored by the Toronto chapter of the National Scrabble Association (NSA), the tournament attracted about 100 scrabbleniks (look that one up), ranging from amateur to expert. The tournament is named for the former director of the Toronto club, who served on several NSA committees and who was named director of the year in 1993.

With more than 150 members, the Toronto club is the largest and oldest Scrabble club in the world, according to club director John Chew.

About one-third of the club's membership is Jewish, including some of its top players. Robin Pollock Daniel, the highest-ranked contestant at the tourney, is also the highest-ranked woman in the world. She finished 13th at the 1995 World Championships in London.

The current world champion is Joel Wapnick of Montreal (he's originally from Binghampton, N.Y.) while Kingston, Ont. native Adam Logan is a former Canadian and North American champion.

Going into the tourney, Pollock Daniel was seeded first, followed by Randy Greenspan at number two. Fourth ranked player was Zev Kaufman followed by Gotlieb at fifth. Rankings are determined by total points accrued in previous matches against similar calibre players.

As might be expected, Pollock Daniel won the tournament, followed by Tim Anglin, Paul Epstein and Jakob Teitelbaum. Teitelbaum, the seventh seed, is a high school student from Montreal. His father, Peter, 18th seed, finished 14th.

For Pollock Daniel, the Toronto tourney is part of the process of getting back into the Scrabble swing of things after taking time off to have a baby. One of the few women at Scrabble's elite level, Pollock Daniel's prescription for Scrabble ability is simple but daunting.

"I think it takes a compulsive personality, someone willing to sit down, study words and spend a lot of time," she said.

Pollock Daniel was introduced to the game while convalescing in hospital. Her room-mate had a board and the two played and played and played. She wasn't very good at first but she improved quickly.

A former boyfriend, David Boys, one of Canada's top players, entrenched her in the game. "He'd started one year earlier. He's immensely talented. We played thousands and thousands of games and I had to keep up with him."

Although her background is in psychology and medical writing, she acknowledges that most top players have a mathematical or scientific bent. Wapnick, for instance, is a professor of music at McGill while Logan teaches math at Berkeley.

"The top players tend to be mathematical, with great visual abilities and great anagrammatic skills" she said. At the elite level, it's not simply a question of knowing words, it's a question of when and where to place them. Players must have visual, spatial and strategic sense, she said.

And, "it's extremely cut throat," so men tend to do better than women. They're "more aggressive on the board" while some women are almost apologetic when they win. Men are more likely to bluff their way with words that could easily be questioned, she added.

Kaufman has been playing since 1981 and has been the Toronto club champion 11 times. A building contractor by profession, Kaufman's education includes a BS in mathematics and an MBA in quantitative analysis.

He agrees that "the game is 50 percent math. You have to figure the probabilities of letters showing up."

Kaufman has another concern when it comes to tournament play. A shomer shabbes, the kipah-clad Scrabble maven is not allowed to punch the timer clock that limits both players to 25 minutes. He also can't write his score.

Since 1983, the NSA has allowed him to keep score by putting a marker in a book with pages corresponding to his point total and he has a "shabbes goy" work the clock for him.

Gotlieb, who finished 22nd in the tournament's A Division, said half the 30 players in the Montreal club are Jewish, including the current world champion. In fact, the 1995 World champion, David Boys, is also a club member (though not Jewish).

Speculating on the high representation of Jews at elite levels, Gotlieb suggests "maybe Jews just enjoy playing with words, pursuing games that involve thought." Most top players also possess mathematical skills, he said.

שירים מאוחרים: טוביה ריבנר הוצאת קשב לשירה.

About Food

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

Anyone who has ever been to Great Neck, Long Island, probably knows of Bruce's Restaurant and Bakery. The bakery is renowned for its premium quality cakes, cookies and pies.

Bruce's melt-in-your-mouth recipes are now available in a great new cookbook, Bruce's Bakery Cookbook (Clarkson/Potter Publishers, $25). Although it's just a little book, it's packed with scrumptious recipes and baker's secrets. This book is a baker's dream!

CHOCOLATE MELT-AWAY COFFEE CAKE

This cake is one of the first to disappear off the shelf at Bruce's, and if you come too late, you won't get one. Now everyone calls in advance to reserve their Melt-Away! This coffee cake is best served warm from the oven, which is a great excuse to dive into it without having to wait until it cools. Enjoy!

Topping:

¾ cup chopped pecans
⅔ cup firmly packed light brown sugar

Cake:

2½ cups all-purpose flour
2½ tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ cup (1½ sticks) unsalted butter softened
1¼ cups sugar
3 eggs
1½ cups sour cream
2 tsp. vanilla extract

Preheat oven to 350F. Grease a 12 cup bundt pan.

In a medium-size bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda, salt and cinnamon; set aside.

In a large mixing bowl, beat butter and sugar until light and fluffy. Add eggs one at a time, beating well after each addition. Add sour cream and vanilla; mix well. Add flour mixture and mix on low until well combined.

Spoon ⅓ (about 2 cups) of the batter into the prepared pan, spreading evenly. Sprinkle with ⅓ of the topping (about 1 cup). Repeat the layering process two more times. Bake for 55 to 65 minutes, or until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean. Cool in the pan on a wire rack for 20 minutes. Remove from pan and cool completely. Serves 12.

The magnificent banquet hall at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, combined with Firestone's legendary quality, value, and personal service, has made this traditional synagogue setting Toronto's leading destination for functions. But it's amazing, says Les Firestone, how many non-members still don't realize they're welcome to enjoy Shaarei Shomayim's facilities for all their Firestone-catered events. "A facility this beautiful should be accessible to everyone — and it is", notes Les.

Shaarei Shomayim's most compelling advantage is that it combines, under one roof, the dignity of a traditional synagogue ceremony with the refinement of a Firestone catered event. Thanks to a recent state-of-the-art renovation, the premises are now the architectural equal of any major hotel, and boast Toronto's largest dance floor. One customer who'd been bar mitzvahd there and was back for his wedding was moved to remark, "this is not a banquet hall; this is Maxim's with a ballroom!" Parking is free and, notes Les, "you'll only have to park your car once; we take care of the rest."

Value has been the cornerstone of Firestone's 40-year legacy, and it keeps people coming back, year after year, generation after generation. "Where others skimp, we splurge" winks Les — meaning your guests get to enjoy that much more of Firestone's exquisite cuisine. Executive chef Jimmy Lyras, a legend in his own right, has been with Firestone for over 30 years. His lengthy term of service underscores the stability and reliability of the entire Firestone operation.

Les and his staff are extremely down to earth, and flexible when it comes to customizing menus. "Everyone wants the meal they serve to be unique, and we do whatever it takes to accommodate that desire," says Les. From the appetizers through the main course, right down to the desserts, Firestone's repertoire extends to the four corners of the world, and "we'll take you to each corner", promises Les.

The tastes of today with the values of yesteryear — no membership required. That's Sam Firestone Caterers at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Take your Wedding Video home, on DVD!

For over 13 years, DMS Video Productions has been producing Toronto's finest videos. "Our primary goal is to satisfy every customer we're privileged to work with. Working with our customers from the beginning until the end, is how we ensure their complete satisfaction," says Darren Sager, President of DMS Video.

When asked "What makes DMS Video different?", Darren responds: "We capture your event without making you feel like you're on a Hollywood set. There simply is no need to film with an ornate amount of equipment and lighting. Your guests will feel comfortable since our approach is unobtrusive from the beginning. Our advantage is the SONY DVCAM Digital system."

Digital cameras can work under much lower light levels than traditional analogue cameras, yet they still deliver a brighter, sharper and more colourful picture. When filming is complete, digital editing ensures that not only will the video maintain the original camera quality, but the tape won't suffer from degradation over time, like programs found on current VHS tapes.

"For the last 2 years, every one of our videos has been digitally mastered. This way, when our customers take home their VHS tapes, they also have the choice to take home a (future-proof) digital master tape that they know will long outlive their VHS tapes and allow them to transfer to a future digital format" says Darren.

Now, DMS Video has moved into the future of video with the introduction of DVD (Digital Video Disc). "We're very excited about this. For the first time ever, we are offering our videos on DVD. Now we can shoot, edit and deliver our videos digitally, so our customers can play their digital videos at home" says Darren.

DVD allows you to access any part of your video within seconds. The convenience of DVD means you can skip through the video just like you skip through songs on a CD. When you're done , no more rewinding, you just pop the disc out of the machine. DVD is the future of home video entertainment delivered today. With a picture quality almost 2½ times sharper than VHS, DVD delivers the quality consumers have long waited for.

"This is going to change the way event videos are viewed and delivered" says Darren. "We're just getting started with DVD and the response has already been overwhelming!"

If you are looking for a video unlike any other, DMS Video is just the studio for you. For more information you can contact DMS Video Productions at (905) 881-7677 or you can visit them on the web at www.dmsvideo.com

Trudeau and Canadian Jewry

By IRVING ABELLA
Special to The CJN

Reflections

What is there left to say? With the long headstart provided by his children who announced weeks ago that their father was gravely ill, the media had ample opportunity to prepare for the death of Pierre Elliott Trudeau. And for the past two weeks a torrent of words flooded the country. Everyone, it seemed, had a memory of Trudeau; everyone had something to add to the public dialogue. He influenced us in so many different ways.

And so we read and listened while old friends, pundits, fellow politicians, supporters, opponents and ordinary Canadians reminisced or told us of chance meetings with Trudeau, or of his life-altering influence on them, our country or on Canadian politics.

But largely missing from this remarkable outpouring of grief was any discussion of the seminal role played by Trudeau in forcing the entry into Canada's ruling circles of its minorities.

Because of Trudeau, Canadian governments would never be the same; they would be more reflective of the country they served. More than any other of our leaders, it was Trudeau who made sure that Canada's ethnic minorities would no longer feel like they were guests, as if they did not belong in this country. He made them feel at home.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Canadian Chosen

TORONTO — Adam Minsky, director of the Canada Israel Experience, has been chosen to take part in a professional leadership seminar conducted by the Institute for Informal Jewish Education, based at Brandeis University. Minsky will join 16 other young Jewish leaders at the seminar later this month in Newport, R.I.

ISRAEL

Weiz Loses Appeal

JERUSALEM — Daniel Weiz, the Israeli soldier wanted in the murder of Toronto teenager Matti Baranovski, has lost his fight against extradition to Canada. Weiz, 19, fled to Israel last November, right after Baranovski was beaten to death in a park by a gang of youths. He was arrested in December. In April, a court ruled he had to return to Canada to face charges. He appealed to the Supreme Court, which rejected the appeal last week. The decision means Weiz must be back in Toronto within 60 days. If convicted, Weiz has the option of serving his sentence in Israel. Ottawa has promised to send him back to Israel if he is sentenced to prison.

Population Density

JERUSALEM — Israel's population density is among the highest in the world, with an average of 278 people per square kilometre, according to the Statistical Yearbook just issued by the Israeli government. The nation's total population is 6.3 million, up 2.5 percent this year, with immigration accounting for 34 percent of the growth.

Warning to Cabbies

JERUSALEM — An Israeli court has sent a severe message to taxi drivers who think they can take unsuspecting passengers for a ride. The court fined a taxi driver $1,750 for overcharging a passenger and refusing to turn on the meter, and suspended his licence for three months. The driver allegedly charged a passenger $4 for a ride that should have cost $2.60.

WORLD

Calming Violence

NEW YORK — Against the backdrop of recent clashes in Israel and the territories, New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani met in his office last week with local Jewish and Palestinian community leaders and called on them to calm tensions in their communities. The New York Police Department is investigating at least five attacks on Jews and Jewish property in recent days, allegedly in response to the violence in Israel. In one incident, a 50-year-old Orthodox man was insulted then stabbed on the second day of Rosh Hashanah, reportedly by a Palestinian American, as he left synagogue with his son. In another incident, four young men waving a Palestinian flag allegedly attacked a Jew at a subway station in Brooklyn and shouted anti-Semitic slurs. A yeshiva bus in Borough Park was set on fire, and a synagogue in the neighbourhood was covered with graffiti. In San Francisco meantime, an Israeli flag was burned and trampled outside the Israeli Consulate.

Shul Firebombed

BERLIN — A synagogue in Dusseldorf was firebombed by vandals who threw as many as three Molotov cocktails against the shul's main door. No one was injured and damage was minimal. The attack came on the eve of the 10th anniversary of Germany's reunification.

Lithuanians Urged

VILNIUS — Participants in a conference here to discuss the return of looted Jewish property have been urged to press their Lithuanian hosts to prosecute suspected Nazi war criminals. Efraim Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Israel, said Lithuanian authorities are "finding innumerable excuses" to avoid prosecuting war crimes suspects. He pointed to the case of Aleksandras Lileikis, the former head of a police unit that turned over Jews to Lithuanian murder squads, who died recently before facing trial.

Egalitarianism Narrowly Defeated

Although 73 percent of voters said yes to full female participation, 75 percent was needed for the resolution to pass. A 26 percent minority torpedoed the change.

In his opening comments, Rabbi Moshe Saks, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec, reiterated his oft-stated commitment to giving women "full and equal access" to synagogue services.

"I'm convinced that this is the religiously and spiritually correct thing to do," said Rabbi Saks. He urged shul members to send the message to their daughters and granddaughters that they are "every bit as capable and loved and empowered as their sons and grandsons."

Members voted on whether to amend the constitution enshrined when the Beth Israel and Sha'arey Tzedec congregations amalgamated as Beth Tzedec some 12 years ago, by deleting from the synagogue's bylaws this phrase: "There shall be no women clergy or women called to the Torah."

Some synagogue leaders, as well as the rabbi, are confident the results will not adversely affect membership levels. Rabbi Saks said the matter will "most definitely be brought forward again at next year's annual general meeting."

"I'm disappointed," he said. "But the closeness of the results shows that we're nearly there."

Palestinian protesters compare Israeli leaders to Hitler

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Palestinian anger at Israel has spilled over to Canada, where protesters marching on the Israeli Consulate in Toronto shouted, "Death to the Jews" and chanted slogans comparing Ariel Sharon and Ehud Barak to Adolf Hitler.

On the diplomatic front, Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy issued a statement that endorsed the Palestinian interpretation of Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount, calling it "inflammatory." That prompted a quick response from the Canada Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobbying arm on the Middle East, which said Axworthy's statement vindicated the Palestinian resort to violence as a way of avoiding diplomatic compromise.

Axworthy's release stated, "Inflammatory actions at this critical time in the peace process serve only to disrupt negotiations and provoke violence."

In response, CIC national chair Joseph Wilder said, "To suggest the presence of any Jew on the Temple Mount constitutes a provocative and inflammatory action is both offensive and gratuitous. Moreover, in this particular case, your suggestion is dangerously inaccurate."

There is evidence the violence was premeditated and promoted by the Palestinian Authority through its TV broadcasts and the participation by Palestinian security forces, the CIC chair stated.

"Arafat and the Palestinian Authority [PA] have long established a pattern of resorting to violence as a tool of diplomacy whenever there is a perception the onus is on the PA to advance the peace process with concessions or compromise in their negotiating positions," he said.

That has left Israel without the security it has bargained for. The minister's comments "only serve to vindicate this most cynical of strategies," Wilder said.

In Toronto, meanwhile, the level of "hatred" during the first of the two demonstrations last Tuesday shocked community leaders, who attended the rally as observers. Particularly disconcerting to representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada was seeing Rashed Saleh, president of Palestine House, comparing Barak and Sharon to Hitler.

The Tuesday rally, organized by a group of Palestinian students and attended by about 150 people, was followed by an even larger demonstration on Thursday, organized by Palestine House. The second demonstration, with dozens of police on hand, was peaceful. Protesters carried a mock coffin, a poster equating a swastika with a Star of David, and chanted slogans, including "Down with Israel" and "Barak and Hitler are the same; the only difference is the name."

Other demonstrations were held at Israeli diplomatic posts in Montreal and Ottawa, as well as in Vancouver. Congress president Moshe Ronen called the first demonstration "an awful experience, very disconcerting and depressing... It's a small example of what Israel faces."

Ronen said Congress and B'nai Brith decided to attend the protest to provide the media with alternative views on Middle East events. As it happened, few reporters covered the rally.

Ruth Klein, national director of B'nai Brith's institute for international affairs, said the protesters "honed in on us. They were really looking for a fight... The mood was being whipped up. I think it could have turned violent."

The seven Jewish observers were ushered from the scene by a plainclothes police offer, who felt their safety was at risk.

"The entire mood of the demonstration was ugly, with a display of naked hatred so intense that one could sense the unspoken threat in the air," Klein said.

"We were taunted and challenged at every opportunity, with a particular vendetta displayed towards obviously Jewish observers, such as men wearing kippas. And the words of hatred soon moved from anti-Zionist epithets to blatant anti-Semitic slurs and even 'etbach al Yehud' [death to the Jews]," Klein stated.

Saleh is one of the local Arab leaders "we've been talking to through the peace negotiations," Ronen said. "If the context in which the Palestinians want to talk to us about the Middle East is what we saw [at the consulate], it's certainly unacceptable."

Saleh acknowledged that "I chanted Sharon and Hitler are the same," but he denied anyone at the rally shouted, "Death to the Jews."

"Against Jews, no, against Israel, yes," he said.

"Right now there are no relations" between the two communities, Saleh added.

A feeling rekindled

From the editor's desk

On the front page of this issue of The CJN is a superbly informative essay by renowned historian Irving Abella that insightfully explores, inter alia, the impact of Pierre Trudeau's policies upon Canadian society generally and upon Canada's Jews specifically.

As a result of Pierre Trudeau, Abella says, Canadian society today is more inclusive of minorities, more tolerant of diversity and more respectful of differences, the key hallmarks of a multicultural place, all of which, of course, is of significant benefit to the Jewish community and to the community at large.

But the multicultural aspect of the late prime minister's imprint upon Canadian life was only one part of the reports, commentaries and analyses that filled the television screens, airwaves, magazine and newspaper pages last week.

The sheer volume of news coverage from the moment of the disclosure of Trudeau's failing health two weeks before his death, until the final departure of the hearse for the cemetery, was remarkable and, one could add, unprecedented in this country.

Obviously the extent and nature of the coverage of Trudeau's demise responded to some deeper calling for such on the part of the Canadian public. The question is why? What was the reason for that heavy demand?

Undoubtedly the reasons are many, complicated and interrelated. Undoubtedly again, much will be written about the phenomenon in the coming days by experts more qualified than I. But there is one observation I wish to share with readers.

Quite apart from any discussion on the substantive merits of Pierre Trudeau's social, economic, constitutional and foreign policies, it is beyond dispute that the former prime minister etched into the international consciousness, a new, higher, more prominent and more flamboyant profile for "Canadianism."

There were many components to that newer sense of Canadianism. It was, of course, felt and appreciated, first and foremost, by most Canadians, so-called ordinary Canadians, that is, all of us. It was a positive feeling, surpassing by a great margin the typical, but essentially negative, Canadian relief at "not being American."

The feeling was based on an amalgam of emotions that were tied to and evoked by the provocative, inspirational, frustrating, contradictory but ever unique characteristics and achievements of our engaging prime minister.

Thus, for much of the Canadian public, the retrospective of Pierre Trudeau's life, which was the essence of last week's enormous news coverage, was a reliving, a revisiting, a reminder, a rekindling of that feeling of the redefined Canadianism that so permeated Canadian life in the late '60s, throughout the '70s and even into the early '80s.

Over the past 15 years, the sense of Canadianism as a distinct national/cultural/social expression has been in rapid decline. There are a number of reasons for this. The cumulative effect of NAFTA, globalization, the Internet, cable TV, the multi-pronged weight of American cultural dominance, the increasing attraction of emulating "American-style" governmental de-investment and downsizing policies, to name but the obvious factors, have smudged the edges of what was, only briefly it now seems, a well-defined drawing of the Canadian identity as personified by Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

The depth of the resonance of the reliving of that "old-time" feeling – as evidenced by the five-day outpouring of emotion – perhaps, was due to the fact that it filled a certain void, namely, the absence of that "old-time" feeling.

To help our younger generation understand more clearly the details of that well-defined drawing of Trudeau Canadianism, I recommend any of the following important books on the former prime minister.

• The Trudeau Albums, released only two weeks ago by Penguin Canada, is a stunning compilation of more than 300 photographs, 100 of which have never been seen before, along with six original essays by award-winning writers such as Mordecai Richler and Peter Gzowski. It is evocative, instructive and deeply poignant.

• The Essential Trudeau, edited by Ron Graham, McClleland & Stewart, 1998, is a pocket anthology of "bite-sized" Trudeau writings arranged under 23 different subjects and form a reference of classic "wisdom" writings.

• Trudeau and Our Times, 2 vols., by Stephen Clarkson and Christine McCall, McClleland & Stewart, 1997, is an engrossing history and commentary of Trudeau and his accomplishments.

• Memoirs, by Pierre Elliott Trudeau, McClleland & Stewart, 1995, is the story of his life as told by the man himself, of course self-serving, but interesting, entertaining and informative.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a rare departure from synagogue protocol, congregants in the main first-day Rosh Hashanah service at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation applauded their rabbi's sermon.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, who has served the traditional Conservative congregation in North York for 19 years, had just announced an imminent increase in women's ritual participation at services, among other changes he feels are necessary.

"To attract young men and women to our shul on a sustained basis, and in so doing, to bring them closer to traditional practice, to Shabbat, to kashrut, to prayer, we have to make sense to them, their realities, the world in which they live," he said.

Rabbi Philip Scheim

""Young women... will not, by and large, be drawn to a synagogue that transforms them into mute spectators. It no longer makes sense for men, in some cases, who have never bothered to take the time to learn to read Hebrew, to have the opportunity, at the drop of a hat, to be called to the Torah, to massacre the words of the blessing; while, on the same Shabbat, a woman who has studied Hebrew diligently and is steeped in Jewish commitment, can aspire only to pull a curtain, if she is lucky.

"It no longer makes sense for a man and not a woman to be able to honour the memory of a parent by being called to the Torah."

The changes would allow women to have aliyot, read the entire parshah instead of just the Haftorah, and to lead parts of the service such as Psukei D'zimra, the introductory psalms of the Shacharit service. Women have been permitted to open the ark at the synagogue for the past few years.

Women would not be counted as part of the minyan, although there are Conservative responsa that permit it, Rabbi Scheim said. That issue is "halachically more difficult."

The 46-year-old rabbi admitted to a degree of discomfort with his newly announced changes. He was ordained by the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary at a time before women were admitted as rabbinical students – and when services there meant separate seating and no participation by women.

"But if [a] difficult step is necessary to create a lot of Jews who will become more enticed by Shabbat – because Judaism will now begin to make more sense to them, to speak to them, and won't insult them – I think the gain will be much greater," he said in a phone interview last week.

Thus far, feedback has been overwhelmingly positive, he reported. Even some of the more traditional members have expressed understanding, he said.

But the rabbi finds it difficult "making good people uncomfortable for what I would say are the right reasons – because they respect tradition."

Nonetheless, he believes that part of growth means the "willingness to make people uncomfortable at times, if it's for the right reasons."

Rabbi Scheim had been wrestling with the issue of women's ritual participation ever since he began teaching his first adult bat mitzvah class four years ago.

"Here was a group of very, very committed Jewish women, very smart women, very desirous of spirituality, very respectful, but kind of feeling unfulfilled in our congregation."

Although the Rabbinical Assembly's committee on Jewish law and standards determines parameters of Jewish law for the Conservative movement, congregational rabbis make halachic decisions for their own synagogues.

The reason women are not called to the Torah at traditional services is a talmudic injunction to respect the dignity of the congregation (kavod hatzibur), Rabbi Scheim explained. In a modern context, he believes that the changes he is introducing would not negatively affect kavod hatzibur.

"Part of why I feel it's important," Rabbi Scheim said, "is that I'm becoming more and more concerned by the lethargy, in terms of most congregants' lack of excitement [at services].

"Wherever we can innovate within Jewish tradition in order to make more sense to people's lives, I think we have to."

Among other innovations he proposed in his sermon, he mentioned an informal alternative service where people could dress casually, and members, especially young members, would lead prayers, read the Torah and prepare divrei Torah.

"That's not to say our services are bad," Rabbi Scheim said, although he would like to see more young people. Most Shabbat morning services end with 10 to 40 children coming to the bimah for kiddush, and there is also a junior service. The majority of regulars, however, are older adults.

"People who come tend to enjoy our services," said the rabbi. But without outreach and innovation, "we risk losing a lot of people."

The purpose of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project is to publicize and promote programmes, activities, and resources from a Jewish perspective for those seeking spiritual, physical and emotional healing.

Holocaust literature collection donated to Centennial College

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is not only acceptable, but entirely appropriate that a 1,000-item-strong collection of Holocaust literature go to Centennial College, a multicultural community college in the heart of Scarborough, rather than to a Jewish site.

The school, best known for its technical focus, has 12,000 full-time and 30,000 part-time students, comprising 80 ethnic groups and 100 languages.

"The collection will teach humanity's capacity for evil and for good," asserted Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Farber was speaking at the dedication of the John and Molly Pollock Holocaust Collection in the still unfinished student centre at the college's Progress campus.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut, honorary chair of the collection's Advisory Committee, went further in his assessment of why this largely non-Jewish institution is a suitable home.

"On Kristallnacht, November 9 and 10, 1938, all the synagogues and houses of Jewish worship in Germany were set on fire. Many burned to the ground, charred beyond recognition," he said.

Everyone has a moral obligation to become involved, become aware and to never stand aside, Rabbi Plaut said. "Evil can never be perpetrated beyond narrow borders, unless indifferent people stand by."

The collection, consisting of some 1,000 works on the Holocaust, was begun in his university days, John Pollock told The CJN, as a way to understand how such a horrendous tragedy could occur.

"See that man [in the picture]?" he demanded. "That was me. That was me." As he turned away, refusing to look at more displays, his wife, Frances said compassionately "If he can't say more, you understand."

Most chilling was a blow-up of pictures from a school primer used in elementary schools in Nazi Germany. One had a blond young boy drawing the "typical" signs of a Jew; hooked nose, wide round head and bent back.

Another had a beautiful, stereotypical Aryan girl being approached by an also stereotypical Jew, bent, as the caption said, on destroying her innocence.

Michael Collymore, president of the Centennial College Alumni Association and a member of the school's board of governors, said the collection would help the college's goal of "embracing the diversity" of the student body, and teach it critical lessons.

Johnson said he hoped the collection would "sensitize our students to the propaganda that cultivated the possibility for what happened."

John Pollock called it "revealing" that "the Holocaust continues to pervade the psyches of Jews and non-Jews alike."

Noting that ignoring the atrocities of the Nazis became "the norm" of how to behave, he stressed that "we must all be involved in preventing cruelty and barbarism."

That is one of the reasons, Pollock told The CJN, that he chose to give the collection to a non-Jewish institution, rather than to someplace where people already know what happened and perhaps have similar material.

The collection will be housed in Centennial's new resource centre, and will form the basis for elective courses on hatred and genocide.

The first course is in development and is expected to begin in January.

Jewish war vets videotape memories

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish War Veterans of Canada are borrowing a page from Steven Spielberg.

The veterans, who claim over 1,000 members across the country, are starting a multi-media data bank of the reminiscences of Jews who served Canada in World War II.

The project's centrepiece will be digitally videotaped interviews with one-time Jewish soldiers, airmen and sailors, in the same vein as Spielberg's successful Survivors of the Shoah Visual History project, which filmed the testimonies of some 50,000 Holocaust survivors worldwide.

The project is still in its infancy, but is being spurred by the forces of time and nature.

'Time is running out'

"Let's face it, time is running out," says the war veterans' executive director Lou Van Delman, who's spearheading the project and conducting the on-camera interviews. "We should have done this 30 years ago. Everyone has a story to tell."

Two interviews have already been conducted, one of them with community activist and lawyer Eddie Goodman.

The goal is to create a digital, audiovisual database that will be cross-referenced and made available to libraries, schools, universities and archives across Canada. It will be housed at the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

But the larger objective is to dispel the myth that Jews did not serve in the Canadian armed forces.

In fact, the war vets say, Jews had special reason to fight: to defeat the very forces that were destroying their co-religionists in Europe.

Of a war-time Jewish population of 160,000, fully 16,000 Jews signed up for service, breaking down as follows: army, 10,235; Royal Canadian Air Force, 5,889; navy, 569; and those who served in Allied Forces, such as Britain or the United States, 163.

In all, World War II claimed about 429 Canadian Jewish war dead, missing, and presumed dead. A total of 334 were wounded and 85 were PoW's. Nearly 200 were decorated.

The project will also interview partisan fighters who battled the Nazis in the forests, and who later settled in Canada.

It's estimated there are as many as 1,500 Jewish veterans of World War II living in Canada.

Veterans will be asked on tape about enlistment experience, how long and where they served, whether they were wounded, if any friends were killed, and how the whole experience affected them. Interviewees will be free to add other details.

Finished tapes will be roughly two hours long.

Prof. Joe Levy, an associate of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, says the data bank will include documents, records, transcripts and any other relevant information, to be transcribed to CD-ROM format.

The veterans have assembled an impressive team of academics to help with research, including professors Irving Abella, Michael Brown and Frank Bialystok.

"Future generations have to know that Jews fought, and fought valiantly," Van Delman says. Many, he adds, helped liberate concentration camps.

Plans also call for a Web site, a national conference of war-era Jewish veterans and the compiling of all existing material on the subject.

Yasser Arafat is duplicitous, mendacious and utterly devoid of honour. This is the inescapable conclusion to be drawn from the violent clashes that have been convulsing Israel, the West Bank and Gaza the past two weeks. It is now clear beyond doubt that he orchestrated the rioting and the bloody mayhem that followed the visit by Ariel Sharon to the Temple Mount last month, that he continued to do so even as he professed profound regret over the spiralling violence to a sympathetic, and in some cases, sycophantic western media and that he had no intention of foreswearing the violence even as he pretended to do so in the halls of the Elysee Palace in Paris.

Arafat's true colours began to show at the July summit meeting in Camp David. He rejected every reasonable compromise offered by Prime Minister Ehud Barak, even compromises once considered inconceivable by Israelis, so deferential that they startled some of the members of Barak's own negotiating team. The statesman's facade slipped.

By vehemently abjuring any Jewish claim to the Old City of Jerusalem, he Islamicized the conflict with the Jewish state. The possibility of a peace agreement was frustrated and ultimately stymied by his prevarications. The American administration was able to see, finally, the transparency of his game: to defeat the Jews, not make peace with them.

The Barak government has travelled farther than any of its predecessors down the road of compromise and accommodation with the Palestinians. But that road, alas, appears to be a dead end, strewn with rocks, stones, rubber bullets and the other photo-op detritus of death that Arafat has planted along the way.

The ugly violence that he unleashed against Israel on Rosh Hashanah was simply the follow-up tactic to his intransigence at Camp David. Sharon's Temple Mount tour was merely the pretext for the follow-up. In fact, the head of Palestinian Authority security, Jibril Rajoub, had assured Israel there would be no violence after Sharon's visit. But that too was obviously part of the ruse.

It is for this reason that the statement last week by Canada's foreign affairs minister Lloyd Axworthy condemning Sharon's Temple Mount tour, but saying nothing about the behaviour of the Palestinian leadership, was so painful to Israel and unhelpful to the cause of peace.

It ignored the truth of the situation. It effectively justified the premeditated, pre-arranged rioting that "erupted" at the instigation of the PLO's armed youth wing and police force. It also encourages Arafat's dishonesty and rewards his duplicity.

Are these the foreign policy goals that the Canadian government espouses? Most fair-minded Canadians are disappointed and even appalled.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Goodbye to a prime minister

As a Canadian law student, I have studied Pierre Elliott Trudeau's crowning achievement, the patriation of the Constitution from England and the enactment of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The charter always gives rise to debate in the halls of the faculty. Some show great disdain for the way in which the charter was enacted and the way in which it imposed a defining "Canadian identity" on all of the country's citizens from coast to coast.

The charter debate intensified when we all studied the patriation reference in our first year constitutional law class. Patriation and the charter were a bold attempt to sever our constitutional dependency on the Parliament at Westminster, vesting power in a bold and confident Canada. Projecting a model of cultural and linguistic integration, Trudeau's vision placed great faith in the capacity of the Canadian people to encounter each other with dignity, respect and common understanding. Yet, when forging new law and taking clear stands on issues such as the role of language and the constitution, one cannot remain above the fray.

Exhibiting incredible confidence bordering on arrogance, Trudeau never shied away from debate. He believed that reason would win out over passion and that reason was invariably on his side. His looming presence follows law students throughout law school, as the questions return in many different forms: How has the charter affected the distinction between law and politics? Why has the court become more active in addressing broad socio-political issues affecting all Canadians? The answer is always the same: the vision, courage and audacity of Pierre Elliot Trudeau.

Raising the profile of the courts through the canonization of rights in the charter and the renewal of federalism through bilingualism and equal treatment of the provinces is not without its critics. Many resent Trudeau's articles and pronouncements undermining the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords. However, no one suggests that Trudeau acted cynically or with personal interests in mind.

Trudeau was unlike any other politician this country has seen in his consistency of thought, belief and action. The late prime minister believed in equality for all people as expressed by Section 15 of the charter; true to his mantra, he advocated reason over passion in building a just society.

Politicians from across the political spectrum should step back and take note that the outpouring of affection for Trudeau crosses political and philosophical lines. Canadians recognize that politicians of courage do not spend their lives analyzing polls to cynically advance an agenda or retain their hold on power.

As political writer Yoram Hazony writes, it takes an idea to move a people. The late prime minister had many ideas and continues to move all of us. I may not bump into the prime minister by chance on the streets of Montreal any longer, but we will all continue to bump into his ideas. They will not die and they will continue to move us in our defence of equality, human rights and the building of a just society.

Goodbye Mr. Prime Minister. You will be missed.

I would like to respond to Felicia Cukier's letter about my remarks regarding Holocaust survivors (CJN, Sept. 28). I believe that we hold similar views, given her letter, and that she has taken my remarks out of context.

In my opinion, most survivors have done well for themselves. I never implied that all survivors have done well. I do believe that individuals in need should be supported and I stated that funds should go to community programs to support elderly and needy survivors. I also stated that funds could go to support Jewish educational services that ensure the sustenance of Judaism through education.

While I applaud Sheldon Kirshner's coverage of Germany's first female cantor, Avitall Gerstetter (CJN, Oct. 5), I take exception to his physically detailed description of her, including the words "a curvaceous figure." The woman is going to be a spiritual leader, and her figure is completely irrelevant. Next time Mr. Kirshner writes about a male rabbi or cantor, I hope he will not let us know whether or not he is "a hunk."

'Thanks' to Ariel Sharon

I would like to thank Ariel Sharon for allowing Israel and the Jewish world to begin the New Year with peace, love and optimism. On this month of change, prayer and atonement, God forbid that we should feel proud of what we have accomplished this year in Israel and within the peace process.

Sharon was good enough to offer a gift to all of Israel and the Palestinians on Rosh Hashanah – his visit "in the name of peace" to the Temple Mount. Let's be clear that the terrible events of the last few days, are exactly what Sharon set out to accomplish.

I hope that all Israelis exercise their rights of democracy in the coming months and prevent this man from ever achieving any real power. That would be a wonderful gift to themselves, world Jewry, and the world as a whole.

Perspectives

The lessons of the rioting

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz daily Newspaper Ltd.

Since Yasser Arafat and his forces were allowed by Israel to enter the territories in the framework of the Oslo agreements, he has prompted rioting three times: In November 1996, after the Western Wall tunnel incident; in May 1999, to mark the Naqba (the catastrophe), as he referred to it; and now, in the aftermath of Sharon's visit to the Al Aqsa Mosque.

Arafat manages these clashes according to a fixed behavioural pattern, in keeping with the fixed structure for the dozens of ceasefires he has signed in the past – and for the most part also violated – with Jordan, Lebanon and now also with Israel. A careful study of these patterns will also reveal how Arafat can be expected to behave during the next confrontation. There are some piercing lessons to be learned from the latest round of rioting:

• The Palestinians may not have a real army, but from the perspective of the Israelis, they hold the key to strategic change in the region, for better or for worse. An agreement with the Palestinians is of strategic importance and the desire to end the conflict with them also stems from this fact.

• The latest clashes have taught us that Israel cannot guarantee real security for the Temple Mount mosques, and the Palestinians are equally unable to guarantee safe passage to the Western Wall. In such a situation, it is doubtful whether the exclusive sovereignty over the Temple Mount of one side could guarantee the safeguarding of the holy sites of the other.

• An exercise conducted in the past by the general staff of the Israel Defence Forces established an iron-clad rule: If Arafat sparks another round of riots, it cannot end with him securing any territorial, political or economic gains. A price has to be fixed for people who initiate violent actions, otherwise they will conclude that violence pays off.

For the moment, it is clear that Arafat is the one who has fixed a steep price for Israel by dragging Israeli Arabs into a violent clash, the likes of which have not been seen since the establishment of the state. Israel responded cautiously. In contrast to developments during the previous rounds of rioting, no closure was imposed on the territories; Palestinians came to work in Israel as usual; and the transfer of goods and fuel to the territories also continued uninterrupted.

• Many Israeli Arabs have undergone a change in attitude toward the State of Israel, even to the point that they are willing to take up arms against the country. By joining the rioting in the territories, they cut off some areas of the country from the rest of the state and inflamed the situation. The police were not prepared for this and were compelled to use a great deal of force. Leaders of the Arab minority are either weak or they are instigators. Under the current situation, Israeli Arabs do not have a bridge to peace with the future Palestinian state. If this trend does not change, the irredentist tendencies of Israeli Arabs will increase and give rise to a tough security problem. This tendency would distance the centrist stream in Israel from a willingness to compromise with the Palestinians.

• From an operational standpoint, the IDF acted properly in achieving its first objective – a minimum number of casualties. But the operational assessment does not end there.

Military strength is not omnipotent and we saw how the soldier posted at Joseph's Tomb bled to death, even though Israeli tanks were parked not that far away, unable to evacuate him. The joint patrols are worthless. The assessment that we will always be able to guarantee open access to all the settlements is incorrect and dozens of them were besieged to some extent or another.

This is a lesson for the future. The IDF is aware that from a military standpoint, holding on to the Netzarim post and Joseph's Tomb is superfluous and only invites trouble. Once calm is restored, these two places should be evacuated in the framework of an agreement.

• Whoever claimed that security arrangements are matters that are easily resolved was mistaken. The riots showed that the Palestinian Authority seriously violated various security arrangements, including the arming of the Tanzim paramilitary forces. In future negotiations, Israel must insist that these security arrangements are upheld.

• It is a big mistake to convince ourselves that Arafat initiated the latest wave of riots in preparation for the concessions he will make on the Temple Mount. This is not the trend and it would be best if we did not delude ourselves by thinking that Israel will be the exclusive sovereign on the Temple Mount. On the other hand, it is not at all certain that Arafat, who is talking peace, has any intention of ending the conflict.

Opinions

Finkelstein strikes out

Contrary to what your first impression might be, this column does not deal with baseball. Rather, it is a report of a book written by the leading Jewish anti-Zionist and anti-Israel writer of our day, Norman G. Finkelstein. His newest book is The Holocaust Industry: Reflections on the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

At first glance it appears to be dealing with a legitimate subject: Is it true that nowadays the Holocaust is being exploited in some quarters for commercial or other reasons? Is there, as Finkelstein calls it, a "Holocaust industry?" In his book the author distinguishes between two Holocaust: one, the event itself, and second, the Holocaust memory as a tool used for political, commercial and other purposes.

In the author's view, "the second Holocaust," is an exploitative enterprise that manages to have Israel depict itself as a victim of Arab aggression and has enabled the Jews of the United States to become its strongest ethnic minority who – because of the Holocaust – are protected from even legitimate criticism. In fact, Finkelstein believes that there is indeed a worldwide Jewish conspiracy that subdues all possible critics, enemies and doubters by waving the Holocaust flag.

If such readings of history were not bad enough, it gets worse: Finkelstein sees a Jewish "conspiracy" – reminiscent of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion – that has made it possible for Jews to extract vast funds from German and other sources and thereby feed coffers of the Claims Commission, the Jewish organization that has been in the forefront of demanding justice for Holocaust victims. For Finkelstein, these reparations are nothing less than a shakedown. In such a view, the successors to the corporations that used forced labour during the Nazi days, are the real victims, and the Jewish conspirators the true aggressors.

It is a foregone conclusion that Finkelstein book will feed the maw of the world's anti-Semites. He supports the thwarted belief that we Jews, led by the Elie Wiesels and their companions, have exploited and continue to exploit an innocent world.

The author, it appears to me, is more than paranoid in his accusations, for compared to his view, ordinary paranoia is a mild disease. For what Jew would call the uses of the Holocaust "the greatest robbery in the history of mankind"?

I admit that there have, on occasion, been misuses of what should be a sacred memory, but nothing that could turn them into an evil conspiracy ruling the world. Not unjustly, one critic of Finkelstein calls him "the founder of a new Holocaust industry, namely his own."

A mixed record for Barak

The outpouring of tributes and analyses as Canadians mourned Pierre Trudeau proved yet again how critical the perspective of time is in analyzing the strengths and weaknesses of political leaders. Nevertheless, in the spirit of the annual cheshbon nefesh, or reckoning, that is undertaken at this time of year, some comments about Prime Minister Ehud Barak's performance and the state of Israeli society are irresistible.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

In his own clumsy and unpopular style, Barak has managed to force Israelis to confront the tough choices that must be made as they seek to renegotiate their position in the region. His greatest success, the withdrawal from Lebanon, has quickly become taken for granted, but in withdrawing, Barak reversed what had been an integral part of Israel's security doctrine for two decades.

In the course of negotiations with the Palestinians, Barak discovered that Israelis are prepared to go a long way for peace. First, the taboo on a Palestinian state has been broken. Barak is the first Israeli prime minister to say what has long been acknowledged as a reality in the making. The Palestinians will declare a state; the debate is over timing and the resulting international support for it. For most Israelis, the issue is the security deal accompanying the declaration and the likelihood of Israeli recognition if the state is declared as the result of negotiations rather than unilaterally.

A second taboo that has been broken is on the debate over Jerusalem. While rhetoric and emotion still overshadow the real issue at the heart of this difficult debate, most Israelis can distinguish between the Jewish and Arab neighbourhoods in east Jerusalem, and most are prepared to grant the Palestinians control over the Arab neighbourhoods.

At the same time, Barak has confirmed international support for Israeli control over all of the Jewish neighbourhoods that have become part of Greater Jerusalem in the last 30 years. At the heart of the matter is one of the holiest areas to Jews – the Temple Mount. If the Palestinians cannot compromise, Barak will likely not sign a deal, but the issue will have been dealt with openly for the first time.

Barak's domestic agenda has not fared well. He has done little to address the critical social policy issues facing Israel as the gap between the haves and the have-nots widens. But he has, again, confronted the issue of the Jewish character of the state differently than his predecessors did. Because of Barak's poor political skills, his creative initiatives in this area have unfortunately been perceived as anti-religious, and he may not be able to change this perception.

Against this background, Israelis are less optimistic than they were a year ago, and Barak is far less popular. One year ago, his coalition was so broad that it was unrealistic. Today, his precarious parliamentary position reflects the divisiveness of Israeli politics more so than actual divides in public opinion.

For whatever they are worth, year-end polls do point to the vulnerabilities of Israel as a democracy. The negative attitude expressed towards Israeli Arabs borders on a racism that would be intolerable in other western societies, and the hardening positions of those who describe themselves as "secular" towards the haredim do not bode well for the future. While Barak may understand what needs to be done to bridge some of these gaps, his vision and personal integrity are not coming across to the people. The result is a frustrated, impatient electorate on all sides.

One can never anticipate developments in Israel. But two recent events will have a serious impact on the domestic political scene. The decision of the attorney general not to indict Benjamin Netanyahu has paved the way for a potentially dramatic leadership race in the Likud. As his actions on the Temple Mount demonstrated, Ariel Sharon is staking out his own territory.

Conversely, the conviction and imprisonment of former Shas leader Aryeh Deri has unleashed a new phenomenon now dubbed "Deriism." The daily prison watch mounted by his supporters is attracting thousands of disaffected Israelis from all backgrounds, and the impact of this popular reaction will not be limited to the Byzantine internal rivalries in Shas. Israeli political analysts are sharpening their pencils in anticipation of an early election in 2001 – but more on this in future columns. Shanah Tovah!

Pierre Trudeau, the Liberals and the Jews

The death of Pierre Trudeau saddened most Canadians, and certainly most Canadian Jews. It certainly saddened me. I came of age with Trudeaumania and admired his vision. As a Montrealer I feel his loss keenly. I would see him occasionally strolling to or from work, with no security in sight – a testament to Canadian civility.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Among my other feelings, his passing leads me to reflect on his ties to Jews, and their ties to him and the federal Liberals.

Canadian Jews, and Montreal Jews in particular, have had a long love affair with the federal Liberals. For many years, that was reflected in their support for Trudeau, either by voting for him directly in the riding of Mount Royal or by voting for Liberals elsewhere. The one relevant study of Canadian postwar voting patterns indeed confirms this tendency for Jews to support the Liberals more than other parties such as the Progressive Conservatives or the NDP.

Why the love affair with the Liberals, and indeed, with Pierre Trudeau? My theory is that most Jews, and most immigrants, liked the Liberals because they seemed to be the party of the centre. Jews, and certainly Jewish immigrants and Holocaust survivors, knew that Jews had suffered from extremist parties of the right and the left in Europe.

When they looked about the Canadian political landscape, they saw the Tories on the right and the CCF/NDP on the left. While both these parties had nothing to do with anti-Semitism, or with anti-democratic forces of fascism and communism, why take a chance? The safest bet was the Liberal party. This was precisely the reason that my parents, Holocaust survivors, never failed to vote for the federal Liberals. Once those habits became ingrained, they proved hard to break.

Even had they known in detail about the dismal refugee record of Mackenzie King's government before the war, I am not sure they would have been dissuaded. That was then. There is no evidence that the revelations about that record, outlined in the best-selling None is Too Many, led to major Jewish electoral shifts.

The fact that the federal Liberals seemed to have the interests of Ontario and Quebec, specifically Toronto and Montreal – where most Jews lived – at heart, also did not hurt. Jews were strong supporters of national unity and bilingualism. The policy and rhetoric of multiculturalism, launched by the Liberals, was also music to Jewish ears. Later on, Jews probably liked the idea of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which held out promise for minorities of all kinds.

Trudeau was, in many respects, perfect for Jews. My guess is that even more than other Canadians, Jews liked the fact that this man was a real intellectual – a cosmopolitan thinker and activist who had stood up to the dark forces of Duplessis' Quebec and in defence of civil liberties well before these became fashionable. Certainly, compared to American presidents such as Lyndon B. Johnson, Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford, Jimmy Carter and Ronald Reagan, Trudeau's erudition and sophistication were a breath of fresh air.

Had many of those Jews explored more deeply, they would have discovered that Trudeau's record on Jewish concerns was uneven. As a youth, like many other young French Canadians, he was not an enthusiastic supporter of Canada's wartime effort against the Axis powers. Later, though he did pass the first Multicultural Act, he was never a real admirer of ethnic particularity. Trudeau was a rationalist and a universalist, and thought ethnic nationalism of any kind – not just French nationalism in Quebec – was rather reactionary.

He never made the hunt for Nazi war criminals an important government priority, and the record of inaction of his and other post-war Liberal governments speaks for itself. He also did not believe in making any formal apologies to Japanese Canadians for their internment. He felt that bygones should be bygones, and there was no point in reopening old wounds that might lead to tension in Canada and detract from common Canadian goals.

His efforts to carve out an independent Canadian foreign policy meant that he would routinely tweak the United States. Some of his efforts, like the opening to China, were wise before their time. But others led to a Middle Eastern policy which was decidedly more even-handed and less explicitly pro-Israel, often to the consternation of elements in the Canadian Jewish community.

All these are minor chords. Pierre Trudeau was a colossus. He helped forge a modern, indeed post-modern, Canada in which Jews and other minorities felt more secure. He will be missed.

The Kirshner File

The 25th annual Toronto International Film Festival, which ran from Sept. 7-16, presented an eclectic array of movies with Jewish content from Israel, Canada, Argentina and the United States. Some are scheduled to open in commercial release across Canada.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Kippur, Amos Gitai's edgy elegy about the 1973 Yom Kippur War, unfolds against the backdrop of thunderous artillery and tank fire and the fog of chaos and confusion. It is autobiographical, told from the viewpoint of a 23-year-old officer who joins an air force rescue team after being unable to find his own unit.

Shot in stark black and white tones, the film opens as Weinraub (Liron Levo), the young soldier in question, walks down a deserted street in Jerusalem on the morning of Yom Kippur. The shops are shuttered and the muffled sound of prayers wafts from a neighborhood synagogue.

The camera then pans on bright daubs of paint on what seems like a painting-in-progress. In fact, Weinraub and his girlfriend are making love, their bodies dripping and flowing with paint as they fuse.

Kippur's pace, peacefully languid until now, picks up as the pair drive toward the Golan Heights. Amid the crackle of gunfire in the distance, they briefly discuss Herbert Marcuse's One Dimensional Man. Only in Israel. As they approach the front, they are instructed to turn back. Only now do they realize that something is terribly amiss. "The Syrians are coming!" a senior officer shouts desperately.

Yet old habits die hard. At a nearby army camp, a cocky officer assures Weinraub and Ruso that the situation is well in hand. "We'll give it to them," he boasts, dropping a stereotypical crack about "dumb Arabs." The Israeli army, he predicts, will reach Damascus within two days. Little do they know that the Yom Kippur War will not unfold with the same swiftness and triumphalism as the 1967 Six Day War.

Gitai turns up the momentum a notch in a scene in which Weinraub and Ruso meet Klauzner (Uri Ran Klauzner), an army doctor whose car has stalled. The three drive to the Ramat David air force base and join a helicopter team which evacuates wounded soldiers and downed pilots.

Theirs is a gruesome task. On their first mission, they fly to an overrun bunker littered with the bodies of Israelis. But the Syrians, the enemy, remain invisible, never to be seen in the film. Back at the base, Yoram (Yoram Hattab), the helicopter pilot, compares the euphoria of the Six Day War with the gloom of this war, which is seen through the eyes of Weinraub and his bedraggled, exhausted and frightened companions.

In Kippur, there are no set-piece battle scenes, just the churning and maneuvering of Israeli tanks in muck and the clattering of choppers landing and ascending. This is not a political film, but Gitai manages to inject a political flourish in a scene where a frustrated rescuer, deep in mud, asks, "What are we doing here?"

Kippur, which reaches a climax when a Syrian missile disables a helicopter in flight, is gritty yet emotionally distant and unsatisfying. It is also lacking in character development; Weinraub, Ruso, Klauzner and Hattab ultimately fail to connect with the audience. Nevertheless, Gitai has produced a fairly strong, unsentimental film which strips war of its illusions.

Fighter, by Amir Bar-Lev, is a spirited documentary about a road trip undertaken by two elderly Czech Jews, Jan Wiener and Arnost Lustig, revisiting their homeland in 1998 after a long absence.

As the pair, both Holocaust survivors presently living in the United States, confront the bitter memories of their youth on an automobile and bus journey which takes them from the Czech Republic to northern Italy, they commiserate with each other and quarrel.

Although good friends, Wiener, 77, and Lustig, 72, could not be more different in terms of their personalties. Wiener, a professor and a wilderness guide, is prickly and short-tempered. Lustig, a professor and a journalist, tends to be ironic and contemplative.

As they plan the trip, they engage in banter with an edge. "I cannot wait to go with this man," Lustig exclaims. "I can wait," Wiener retorts.

In Prague, Wiener confronts a Czech collaborator who granted him an exit visa but who predicted that he would not live long enough to wear out a pair of shoes. Instead of killing the man, as he had promised himself, he smacks him in in the face. The incident touches off an argument between Wiener and Lustig about Czechoslovakia's precipitous descent into communism.

A pilot with the Royal Air Force after his escape from Nazi-occupied Europe, Wiener did not fare well after the 1948 Communist takeover. Interrogated by the secret police in 1949, he was accused of "anti-state activities" and subsequently lost his position as an English teacher. Then, charged with being a British spy, he was imprisoned from 1950 to 1955. Lustig, on the other hand, was a Communist party member and a Radio Prague reporter before his disillusionment with the repressive system.

Visiting the Theriensienstadt concentration camp, where Wiener's mother was beaten to death and where Lustig toiled as a labourer building a rail link to Auschwitz, the friends reach common ground.

From Terezin, they travel on to Slovenia, where Wiener's father and stepmother committed suicide and left him to face a hostile world alone; and thence to Italy, where he was incarcerated by the authorities. Here, again, they clash, vowing never to speak again.

Despite the lingering bitterness, Lustig's high opinion of Wiener as a hero and a fighter never wavers. Somehow, their friendship endures, and in Fighter, Bar-Lev distils its very essence with sensitivity and elan.

Waiting for the Messiah, directed and co-written by the Argentine filmmaker Daniel Burman, turns on the theme of the randomness and unpredictability of life.

The stock market in Tokyo plummets and a bank in Buenos Aires goes bust. Among its victims are Simon Goldstein (Hector Alterio), a restaurant owner who loses his modest savings, and Santamaria (Enrique Pineyro), a bank employee who loses his job and his wife. Thanks to a chance phone call, their lives intersect through Goldstein's son, Ariel (Daniel Hendler), a young man chafing at the bit. The financial collapse, which takes place on the eve of Chanukah and Christmas, propels Daniel into a relationship with Laura (Chiara Caselli), an alluring bisexual woman, and sets Santamaria on the path of a new lifestyle.

Tobias Schneebaum, a gay, Jewish New York City painter and museum guide, achieved his proverbial 15 minutes of fame in 1969 with the publication of a riveting memoir about his remarkable relationship with a primitive tribe in Peru's Amazon jungle.

Schneebaum, a droll, personable fellow, blended so seamlessly into the surroundings that he participated in a raid against a neighbouring tribe and then, at a feast, partook of a meal consisting of the flesh of the slain warriors.

In Keep The River On Your Right: A Modern Cannibal Tale, a fascinating documentary, David and Laurie Gwen Shapiro relate Schneebaum's surrealistic adventures in Peru as well as in New Guinea, where he formed a close romantic friendship with a tribal chief. Truly amazing stuff.

The Nazi persecution of homosexuals, the subject of Rob Epstein's and Jeffrey Friedman's Paragraph 175, is a solidly crafted documentary which draws on talking heads and archival footage from the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Far from adhering to their official policy of "re-educating" gays, the Nazis exploited them as slave labourers and even castrated them. Upwards of 15,000 were dispatched to concentration camps and few survived that ordeal. Gad Beck, a half-Jewish gay tormented by the regime, is one of the most interesting interviewees in this informative film.

Three Canadian shorts: Aubrey Nealon's Abe's Manhood is an insouciant foray into one young man's rite of passage through circumcision so that he can tap into his Jewish roots. Francine Zuckerman's evocative and biographical Passengers examines a father-daughter relationship through the medium of flashbacks and fast-forwards. The Walnut Tree, Elida Schogt's enigmatic experimental film about the Holocaust in Holland, is a deeply personal exploration of her doomed grandparents.

Sukkah a symbol of many layers

By RABBI MICHAEL DOLGIN

Rabbinic Reflections

Sukkot is a holiday of unusual mixtures, especially in Canada in October. As I write, I can almost imagine icicles hanging from the sukkah this year.

However, this observance connects us with the seasons in the land of Israel as well as with the environment here. Likewise, the traditions and texts of Sukkot as it begins this Shabbat help us focus on challenges we face in our local community and in our homeland.

The sukkah is a symbol with many layers. It reminds us of the dwellings of our ancestors as they left Egypt and of their temporary booths in the fields at harvest time in their land.

When we dwell in a sukkah today, we trade a place of permanence for a more temporary space. Usually insulated from the elements, we allow our lives to be more directly affected by the natural elements beyond our control.

As we choose to expose ourselves to a less secure world, we cannot help but be reminded of the plight of those who live among us with no proper home. There are too many in our society for whom a sukkah would be an improvement on their permanent dwelling.

When Sukkot ends, we will return to eating and living in our warm, secure homes. Let us not forget those who continue to face the vagaries of homeless existence all around us.

This Sukkot comes at a crucial time for our brothers and sisters in the land of Israel as well. It is difficult to know what the coming weeks and months will bring, but it seems certain that they will be challenging.

The words of the Haftorah for the first day of Sukkot (Zechariah 14) have rarely seemed as emotionally charged as they do this year. In the middle of the Haftorah, we read: "Living waters will come forth from Jerusalem." We then find the famous words with which we conclude Aleinu L'Shabeyach: "On that day, the Eternal will be One and God's name will be One."

The prophet Zechariah seems to be describing a time where the oneness of God is reflected in our land and our holy city. We can relate to these hopes for peace. However, these verses are surrounded by descriptions of conflict and battle, plague and punishment.

Can we have peace without violence? Can we maintain our own security without seeing that others suffer as a result?

It would seem that these questions are not new. They have been a part of our communal life for thousands of years. Even though these issues are now addressed by leaders and politicians, our future seems to rest as much on faith, hope and vision as on negotiation.

Can we look beyond our narrow understandings to see a new time of peace for Israel? Can we envision a future that offers shalom for Israel and all nations? Sometimes it is difficult to be ready for new answers and opportunities.

How can we escape the distrust and enmity of generations? Again, the words of the prophet challenge us to have hope: "It shall come to pass that at evening time, there will be light."

Even when the future seems darkest, let us always hope and work for the light of peace.

A summer to remember

By RACHEL SARI FEGELMAN

Guest Voice

This summer I was privileged to take a journey to Israel as part of the Jerusalem Fellowships program of Aish HaTorah.

I was not prepared for the incredible experiences, the deep, unbounded friendships I gained, nor the knowledge that I retained. Being part of the Jerusalem Fellowships was more than just a trip to Israel – it became a home away from home for all of us.

The fellowships are available for people aged 18 to 26 who have not had an extensive Jewish background. In our group of 50, 29 of us came from Toronto, and the others from all across North America.

After having been in the Holy Land for only 24 hours, we felt a bond that we never felt before. We had come to Israel on a mission and that mission held us close. We came to see the land of the Jewish people, the land that has given us hope and freedom.

Like any other young adults, we also came to clarify our beliefs and to find some answers.

The many lecturers we heard included MIT professors, Israeli politicians, army intelligence officers and knowledgeable rabbis, as the classes were a key element in our trip. And these talks helped us discover a great deal about each other and about ourselves.

In our informative sessions on Israeli politics, we heard the reasoning behind the peace process and the arguments of those opposed to it. We also had enlightening classes on Judaism and spirituality. We even learned some Jewish meditation!

Yet we also prayed at the Western Wall, rode camels and horses, hiked the Banias mountains, went to Ein Gedi and Masada, floated in the Dead Sea, slithered through bat caves, rafted down the Jordan river and partied every night!

Now that I've settled back into life in Canada, the real work begins for me – how to carry with me the piece of Jerusalem and the knowledge and experiences I gained there. It has proven to be a difficult task in readjusting to life here.

I feel as if no one understands my experience. My relatives and friends say, "That's so nice, dear," and have no clue as to what I'm talking about. I suppose the best remedy is to remind myself of the wonderful memories of my experience with the fellowships.

I hope that if I hold on to these memories, then Israel and my experience there will hold on tight to me. For some, Israel can be a place where the important issues in life become clearer. For others, Israel is a place to escape. For us, Israel is home.

And so now I try to keep the memories strong as I write e-mails late at night to my new friends and teachers, while term papers lie on the desk. And I will remember it all next Passover, when I secretly smile and sit around the seder table among family and friends, saying, as always, "Next year in Jerusalem."

For more information about upcoming Jerusalem Fellowship trips in December, February and in the summer, call Aish HaTorah at 905-764-1818, ext. 225, or contact the Web site at www.goisrael.com.

Lessons from our past

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

With Sukkot upon us, it is interesting to take a step back in time to see if we have preserved the nuances of the holiday.

Sukkot was the first of the pilgrimage holidays that occurred in the new year. All of Israel would make a pilgrimage to the Temple in Jerusalem and spend the week offering a multitude of various sacrifices. Although today we do not have a Temple and therefore we do not have pilgrimages and sacrifices, it seems that we have also lost the essence of the intent underlying the system.

The rabbis of the Talmud tell us that the week of Sukkot was spent offering 70 different sacrifices at the Temple. These sacrifices represented the 70 different nations of the world.

In other words, we were offering sacrifices to God on behalf of all the other nations. We were including all nations in our celebration and beyond that, we were asking God to look kindly upon all the nations of the world.

Since Sukkot is the time in which we pray for rain for the year, it is interesting that we recognized this to be a universal request and we were careful to include all of humanity in our offerings to God. Only once we had accomplished this were we then allowed to offer our own personal offerings on the last day of the holiday.

There is another portrait of inclusion that occurs in the Talmud also connected with Sukkot, also lost to our modern world. During this holiday we celebrated the water libation. We are told that the joy and happiness that pervaded this ritual was unparalleled. Because of this unbridled joy and celebration, precautions were taken to insure appropriate behaviour and the men and women were kept separate in the Temple.

Yet, interestingly, the Talmud describes the setup of the Temple and that the women's section was equipped in parallel with the men's. Whatever ritual objects were present in the men's section were also present for the women.

The Levites stood on the stairway between the two sections and offered their music and prayers from there. The processional wound its way through the men and subsequently through the women. We were separated but we were all included. Decorum was maintained, holiness was preserved and we were all engaged.

With a glance toward our history, we can bring back the essence of a community and instill guidelines for ourselves. We cannot pray only for ourselves when we share a world with others. We cannot engage some members of the community when all of its members crave inclusion.

We must never accept that in order to maintain decorum we condone apathy. We no longer have a Temple and we have had to stop performing many of the ancient practices because of its loss. But we must take care to insure that the nuances that define us did not disappear with the destruction of a building.

Sukkot: a time to be happy

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Q: How do you make a lulav shake?

The answer may seem obvious but on the Web, anything is possible.

A: To make a lulav shake, take two scoops of mint-chocolate-chip ice cream or lime sherbet. Add celery stalk for Lulav. Top with lemon drops for Etrog. [http:// www.jcn18.com/holiday/tishri/lulav_sh/ shake00.htm]

It is time to celebrate one of the most joyful festivals in the calendar, Sukkot/ Shemini Atzeret/ Simchat Torah. The "lulav shake" riddle is taken from the Jewish Communication Network's site, where they have some novel ideas for teaching kids about Sukkot. But there is more out there about the holiday. For a comprehensive summary of traditions, check out the Jewish Theological Seminary site [http://www.learn.jtsa. edu/ sukkot/] and Chabad's JewishNewYear [http://www.JewishNew Year.com/holidays/tishrei/4126].

One of the other names for Sukkot is Z'man Simchataynu – the Time of our Happiness. But in the essay Happiness is...A Cozy Succah [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/succah.htm], Robin Treistman asks an important question: "Succot: what a bizarre holiday ... We are commanded to be happy... How can the Torah tell me to be happy?"

The tone may be cheeky but the question is profound.

Sukkot traditions are well known but what about the reasons behind them? For a detailed description about the blessings over the lulav and etrog, and for some of the laws of the building of the sukkah, try [http://www.vjholidays.com/sukkot/].

There is much discussion about the "four species" (lulav, etrog, myrtle branch and willow branch) which are all bound together in order to say the blessing. Rabbi Irving "Yitz" Greenberg of CLAL, The National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership says that the species can teach us about tolerance and pluralism [http://www.jewish.com/holidays/suk guide.shtml]. According to Rabbi Greenberg, we can disagree with other Jews, while admitting that they bring strength to Clal Yisrael. "And the great reward of this binding is that when disparate elements come together, their fragrance and flavour rub off on one another."

For more on the the four species and the Jewish people, see Ohr Somayach's The Succah and the Four Species: Two Ways to Unity [http: //www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/sukkos/succ95.htm] and a related article at Aish Hatorah [http://aish.com/holidays/sukkot/last/unityandjoy.htm].

For all botanists out there, Tel Aviv University [http://www.tau.ac.il/lifesci /bot any/lulav.html] supplies Latin names for the Etrog, Hadas, Arava and Lulav. (My, what a lovely phoenix dactylifera you are shaking. Was it expensive?)

A holiday with a strong tie to food, Sukkot's other name is Chag Ha'Assif, the Harvest Holiday. The Jewish-food Sukkot index has several suggestions for keeping warm while dining out(side) [http://www.jewishfood.org/recipes/sukindex.htm]. You can find recipes for Braised Moroccan Lamb with Prunes, Almonds and Apricots and Hearts of Lulav (Palm) Salad.

There is a tradition to read King Solomon's Megillat Kohelet or the Book of Ecclesiastes during Sukkot. If your browser can handle Hebrew, you can read Kohelet in Hebrew and in English at [http://www.breslov.com/bible/Ecclesiastes.htm]. And for a thought-provoking essay on this book, see Futility and Cockroaches [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/kohelet.htm].

A selection from Kohelet attained popular fame a few years ago when folksinger Pete Seeger adapted the beginning of the book's third chapter to his song Turn, Turn, Turn [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/6378/turn.html]. The Byrds, a rock group, made the song into a number one song. To hear an excerpt, try [http://www.lega cyrecor dings.com/TheByrds/music.html#turn].

For something more traditional but perhaps less familiar, you can listen to some Sephardi tunes sung by Syrian Jews at Simchat Torah at [http://www.613.org/music/pizmon/piz.html]. And for something a bit less traditional why not [http://www.vjholidays.com/sukkot/shlock.htm]? That's where you can listen to the Jewish group Shlock Rock's arrangement of All Shook Up.

Associated report stresses importance of adapting to changes in education

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The report of the strategic planning committee of Associated Hebrew Schools will not be left to gather dust on an office shelf, says committee chair David Brown.

Rather, it is seen as a "living process," he told The CJN. "We decided that if something could and should be implemented [right away], it would be."

The establishment of a middle school at the Leslie campus, revamped report cards, the hiring of a public relations specialist, and better communication between administration and staff and staff and parents, are just some of the changes to the face of the nearly 100-year-old-school, he said.

The study was begun during the presidency of Sheldon Goodman, Brown said. "Since we were entering the 21st century, we wanted to take a look at ourselves – who and what we are, the internal and external environment, where we are going and how do we get there."

The school wanted to know how best to serve its constituency, taking into account trends in Jewish education in Toronto as well as across North America.

As well, Brown said, "we recognized that the Jewish educational scene in Toronto has changed radically. People have more choice [in schools] and are more selective."

The goals and educational approach of Associated has "naturally evolved" over the years, and it was felt that the public didn't really understand what they were, Brown said.

An attempt was made to involve all those with a stake in the school – students, teachers, administrators, parents and the board, Brown said.

The study took some four years, and the final document gave 44 recommendations. However, "we don't consider the project finished – it will be ongoing," Brown stressed.

The mission statement was formalized "to continue our long history of providing our students with an excellent Jewish and general studies education, based on Torah values, in a safe and supportive learning environment."

Some of the goals of the school include teaching Hebrew studies in Hebrew (Ivrit B'Ivrit); continuous evaluation of all aspects of the school program, including educators, curriculum and student performance; and ensuring regular dialogue between educators and parents regarding curriculum, academic and behavioural expectations and individual student achievement.

Associated wants to foster a commitment to a Jewish way of life, the State of Israel, the Jewish people and Torah. The report also stressed the need to accommodate students regardless of Jewish religious affiliation or economic means, and to encourage parents to take an active role.

Communication, which the report sees as a major need, has been partly addressed by hiring a public relations specialist, by publishing a newsletter, updating the parents' manual and providing the parents with curriculum outlines, defining the courses and expectations.

One need that the report identified as immediate, and that has been implemented, was the hiring of a special needs co-ordinator, to deal with those whom the teachers feel need some sort of individual attention.

Other recommendations include creating a school flag; giving special recognition to exceptional staff; developing alternative funding strategies to offset shortfalls in community funding; investigating alternative uses for school facilities; reviewing the composition, operation and functions of the board of directors; the use of standardized and provincial testing; and streaming.

The Toronto community is so diverse, Brown mused, that Associated has to try "to be a resource for those on the left and the right."

"We teach traditional Judaism – values, morals, Halachah, and dinim (laws), but we don't indoctrinate."

Information was gathered mainly through focus groups, one consisting of parents and community members, one principals and supervisors, one staff, and one from the board of directors. Each group discussed their concerns and made recommendations both for immediate action and long-term goals.

Ehrlich family returns to Germany for reunion

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — During the Holocaust, most of the 250 Jews in Bad Kissingen, in central Germany, were killed.

But a remnant, the Ehrlich family, whose roots go back to the 18th century, survived by either leaving for Israel or being rescued by relatives in other countries between 1933 and 1938, as signs of the oncoming tragedy grew more ominous. None of them ever returned to live in Germany.

In September, a total of 49 descendants of the Ehrlich family had a reunion in Bad Kissingen. They were welcomed at a civic reception by the mayor and his council and given commemorative medals.

"My great-great-grandfather was born there, as I was," said Phil Ehrlich, 82, a retired Toronto electrical contractor. In 1938, Phil was rescued by an uncle in England and was interned in Britain as a German national at the outbreak of World War II. He was one of hundreds of Jews later interned in Canada.

There were 13 relatives from England at the reunion.

The Israeli group, which comprised half the attendees, included Shoshana Ben David, Phil's sister, and her husband Ansel, who was an IDF officer and Israeli civil servant.

Steffi Hernstadt, 85, progenitor of four generations in Israel, was one of those who attended. Hernstadt was active at the festivities and honoured for her idea of the reunion for the clan. Her daughter Ilana helped her carry out her dream.

Another Israeli guest was Joske Ereli, Phil's brother, who is a travel administrator at Ein Gedi, a kibbutz on the Dead Sea. Over the past 20 years, the frequent contacts Joske had with German tourists at his kibbutz paved the way for the Ehrlich reunion.

Joske and his wife Rachel were welcomed with open arms by his counterparts in Bad Kissingen.

"They were extremely good to us and wonderful hosts, providing a bus which took us on a two-day tour of the area," said Pearl Ehrlich, Phil's wife. "We were shown the plaque to the Jews who died, and the site where their synagogue was destroyed on Kristallnacht."

Some members of the Ehrlich family have a video which presents the history of several Bad Kissingen families.

Phil's father Ludwig, proprietor of the family's department store, and his mother had a narrow escape from the Holocaust. They were at the train station in Bad Kissingen on their way to Toulouse, France, to visit their daughter, Shoshana, when they heard their names called over the loudspeaker to report to an official who was identifying Jews on behalf of the Nazis.

Instead, they boarded the train which bore them to safety.

JVS fund named for former president/director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

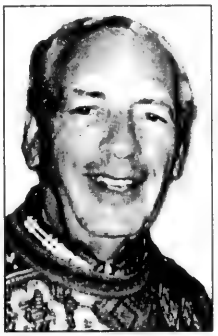
TORONTO — A former president and director of Jewish Vocational Services, who died earlier this year, was honoured at the 53rd annual meeting of JVS with the establishment by his family of a scholarship in his and his wife's names, and with the presentation of an Outstanding Employer Award in his name.

David Mouckley, a businessman who was involved in JVS for more than 40 years, was "a fantastically spirited fellow" who flew his own plane, JVS executive director Karen Goldenberg told The CJN.

Mouckley, 75, died last March in Florida in an accident involving two small planes. He was, however, a passenger at the time.

"He had all this energy, all this sparkle," she recalled.

"It was not unusual for David to encourage and actively assist some of his employees to return to school, to upgrade their skills and credentials and to resume a former skilled or professional occupation," said Bernard Berger, former JVS executive director, at the annual meeting.



David Mouckley

"When they tried to compensate him for his generosity, he declined their offer and told them that all he asked for was that they do the same for someone else in need."

Berger also recalled Mouckley's contributions as a rehabilitation committee member, assisting JVS staff in developing strategies for what he called a pioneering program, using work and counselling as therapeutic tools to help people with physical, emotional and mental disabilities become fully functioning members of society.

The David and Eunice Mouckley Memorial Fund will help specified JVS clients "pursue training and education to achieve their potential," said Goldenberg.

The Outstanding Employer award was presented to Sears Canada, which provides employment to JVS clients, including single mothers, new Canadians and people with disabilities. Mouckley's friend Jerry Black, Sears' national manager of purchasing, received the award on behalf of the company.

Serve food that conjures up memories of Sukkot

By LINDA MOREL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

I can still picture the loosely constructed hut built behind my synagogue in New Rochelle, N.Y., every Sukkot. During my childhood, I'd reach for eggplants, red peppers and apples pinned to interior walls and hanging from branches entwined in its roof. I inhaled the scent of autumn air and fresh produce.

With frost on the pumpkins, the scene signified the harvest in a way that Thanksgiving never could, because this flimsy hut with its dangling fruit enveloped me in nature.

Each year, women from the temple sisterhood swarmed around a buffet set out on picnic tables, fretting as steam rose off casseroles fresh from the oven.

"Eat quickly, eat quickly," they'd say, hoping that everyone would get a hot meal. But their efforts were useless on those chilly nights.

Yet I loved sharing tepid food within those produce-covered walls, which combined an atmosphere of hospitality and camping out. In contrast to formal dinners during the Days of Awe between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, Sukkot was joyful and user-friendly.

As a child in the 1950s, I was confused between the words Sukkot, the holiday, and sukkah, or hut, which is covered by weaving cuttings of evergreens and leafy shoots through a lattice. The rabbi once explained that these branches should be thick enough to afford shade, but sparse enough for stars to shine through at night. Back then, I always checked to make sure they did.

Now as we face a new millennium, Sukkot steadfastly cleaves to its agrarian roots. When the ancient Israelites lived in Canaan, Sukkot was a gathering festival. At the time, the Israelites flocked to Jerusalem, offering grains, fruit, olive oil, wine and animals to the Temple. During the festival, they dwelled in hastily assembled huts, the precursor of the modern sukkah.

Today, few of us gather crops, but many people build huts in their backyards. In New York City, where vertical living prevails, enterprising Jews sometimes erect a sukkah on apartment terraces or building rooftops. "The elevation brings us closer to the stars," says a Brooklyn mother of two about her roof-garden sukkah.

Apartment dwellers in Los Angeles often place huts on fire escapes, even though they are violating fire codes. Aware of this practice – and the holiday – the police department issues these people a summons, requesting that the hut be removed in eight days.

Wherever the sukkah is located, the point is to invite family and friends to partake in as many outdoor meals as possible during the holiday.

People lacking lawns or construction skills can participate in festivities at many synagogues, where volunteers frame and decorate a sukkah. On the holiday's first night, some congregations hold potluck dinners for their membership. Yet concern over keeping food hot outdoors still prevails.

"At our annual Sukkot dinner, I bake a noodle pudding at home, pulling it from the oven and rushing straight to temple," says a resident of Manhattan, relieved that she lives nearby. To avoid transporting bubbling casseroles or competing for limited space in synagogue ovens, it is wise to simplify at Sukkot.

Think of the holiday as a large-scale picnic. Because carrying food outdoors takes effort, the menu should be selected with care.

The most practical dishes for Sukkot are prepared in advance, easily assembled and served at room temperature.

The make-ahead menu below features lamb, romaine lettuce, squash and dried fruit, all of which hearken back to harvest festivals from ancient Israel.

Because cucumbers and grains are also traditional at Sukkot, your dinner could include a selection of pickles and multigrain breads.

Paper plates and plastic cutlery are acceptable at large gatherings. Roll napkins around cutlery, tying them with vines of English ivy. To underscore the holidays informality, cover the buffet surface with a patchwork of contrasting tablecloths.

ROAST LEG OF LAMB

1 8-pound leg of lamb
2 cloves garlic, sliced
Salt and pepper to taste
No-stick vegetable spray

Preheat oven to 350. Cut small slits in lamb and insert garlic. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Coat roasting pan and rack with no-stick spray. Place lamb on rack and insert meat thermometer according to package directions. Roast uncovered for 4½ to 5 hours or until thermometer indicates lamb is done. Transfer lamb to a cutting board and let stand for 30 minutes. Slice thin. Recipes yield 8-10 servings.

CARROT-RAISIN SALAD

1 head Romaine lettuce, cut into bite-sized pieces
6 carrots sliced
¾ cup raisins
¾ cup seasoned croutons
¾ cup vinaigrette salad dressing

Place all ingredients in a large bowl and toss.

ROASTED VEGETABLE MEDLEY

4 medium eggplants, peeled
6 tomatoes
4 zucchini
4 large onions
Olive oil
Salt to taste

Spray two 9 x 13-inch ovenproof casseroles with vegetable spray. Slice eggplants, tomatoes and zucchini into thin rounds. Slice onions into thin rings. Starting with onions, arrange vegetables in layers in both casseroles. Drizzle olive oil over each layer and season with salt. Roast vegetables at 300 degrees, stirring every 20 minutes. Roast for three hours or until vegetables are light brown. Because vegetables shrink, combine them in one dish. Serve warm or at room temperature. Recipe can be made three days ahead.

DRIED FRUIT SALAD

2 jasmine tea bags
4 cups mixed dried fruits (any combination of pears, peaches, prunes, figs, dates or apples – plus raisins and apricots, which are mandatory).
1 cup blanched almonds
1 cup pine nuts
¼ cup honey
1 vanilla bean
2 tbsp. amaretto

Steep tea bags in 2 cups of boiling water. Place fruit, nuts, honey and vanilla in a large bowl. Cover with hot tea. When cool, add amaretto and stir. Place overnight in the refrigerator. The liquid will turn amber. Bring to room temperature. Remove vanilla. Transfer fruit to a crystal bowl and gently mix.

Rabin scholarship aims for tolerance through education

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A peace agreement between Israel and its Arab neighbours is inevitable, says Clara Balinsky. What she's not so sure of, however, is whether these former enemies will know how to live with one another.

"How will the people who are most affected by the settlement learn to change their attitudes toward each other?" asks Balinsky, chair of a post-graduate scholarship fund established in Yitzhak Rabin's memory.

"How will they become tolerant of their differences?

"I feel very strongly that the road to peace in the Middle East between people can only come through education and understanding of one another's difficulties and problems," she contends, even though current hostilities may indicate otherwise.

"This is vital not only to the Palestinians, Jordanians, Egyptians and Syrians, but also to the Israelis," she adds.

Balinsky, 80, is the founding chair of the Rabin Scholarship Fund for Advancement of Peace and Tolerance at Jerusalem's Hebrew University. The fund, named for the late Israeli prime minister, sponsors a year of doctoral or post-doctoral study for a Jewish Israeli, an Arab from the Middle East and a Canadian of any background.

In addition, a distinguished fellow, someone of international prominence in the promotion of peace, is appointed to spend a few weeks at the university.

The scholarship, established by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, covers tuition for a full academic year – from October to April – at the university's Harry S. Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace, as well as airfare and living costs.

To date, the fund has raised about $2.5 million to ensure the scholarship program continues annually. Most of the money was collected during Leah Rabin's speaking tour of Montreal and Toronto in 1996, the year after her husband's assassination.

"Mrs. Rabin agreed that in order to stop hatred, there had to be a change in attitudes and the university was a good place to begin that process," says Balinsky, who hopes the endowment will eventually reach $10 million.

"We are building for the future," she says. "What we need is more funds in order to attract more scholars to the program, and to widen its scope to include more Arabs, Jews and Canadians."

The first three Rabin scholars completed their year of studies last spring, and another three are starting this month.

The Canadian, Mira Sucharov of Vancouver, said she applied for the scholarship to further her dissertation research, which required time in the field conducting interviews in Israel.

"My biggest challenge was to gain access to the key Oslo [peace accord] decision-makers. This I achieved," said Sucharov, who is now completing her doctorate at Georgetown University. Her plans are to continue working as an educator and researcher in the field of peace and tolerance.

The other two students in the program's inaugural year were Israeli Eldad Pardo, who has just completed his doctorate at the University of California at Los Angeles; and Palestinian Mohammed Nakel, who is continuing his doctoral studies at Hebrew University.

The distinguished fellow last year was Canadian writer Michael Ignatieff, author of Blood and Belonging, an examination of ethnic nationalism in the 1990s, The Warrior's Honour: Ethnic War and the Modern Conscience, and Virtual War: Kosovo and Beyond.

"Jerusalem evokes more emotion than any other city in the world," said Ignatieff.

After his three weeks there, he finds himself asking, "How are we going to negotiate the non-negotiable?"

Balinsky says it is hoped Ignatieff and the three scholars will speak in Canada during the coming year about their views on the peace process. The scholars are also expected to lecture and write about their experiences in peace education in their homelands.

The 2000-2001 scholars are Sharryn Aiken of Toronto, and Israelis Hillel Cohen and Entehal Ghanim.

Aiken, a refugee and immigration lawyer, is currently a visiting lecturer at York University's Osgoode Hall Law School. She is also pursuing a doctorate at Osgoode and said time in Israel will allow her to expand her thesis research.

Her thesis is an examination of constitutionalism and international law as tools for creating morally responsible societies, with Canada and Israel as case studies.

"I have chosen Canada and Israel as they share a common trajectory in terms of claims asserted against the state by others – First Nations in the Canadian context and Palestinians in the Israel context," she says.

"For both countries, effective resolution of these claims is fundamental for peaceful and tolerant communities."

A longtime human rights advocate, Aiken says the objectives of the Rabin scholarship "reflect values I cherish and attempt to uphold in my own life. Working across differences, fostering understanding and promoting social justice have animated my career."

The scholarship recipients are selected by academic committees in Israel and Canada. The Canadian committee is chaired by former Université de Montréal rector René Simard. Candidates must demonstrate "superior academic abilities as well as individual initiative and leadership skills."

Sephardi refugee claims planned

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As Mideast peace negotiations enter a critical phase, the fate of Palestinian refugees remains unresolved. The issue is high on the Palestinian agenda, but as far as two Jewish non-governmental organizations (NGOs) are concerned, Palestinian claims must be balanced against the right of compensation for Sephardi refugees from Arab lands.

In recent months, the American Sephardi Federation (ASF) and the International Committee for Jews From Arab Lands (ICJAL) have stepped up their efforts to include restitution for hundreds of thousands of Sephardi Jews as part of an overall settlement.

They have circulated more than 75,000 questionnaires to Sephardim around the world – including Canada – asking them to list the property that was lost when they were forced to flee their homes following the creation of the State of Israel.

They plan to use the list to substantiate monetary claims when restitution funds are distributed, as well as to create a database for historians and researchers.

Naim Dallal, founder and past president of the Iraqi Jewish Association of Canada, said it is "my understanding that the assets of the Jews from Arab lands will be settled along with [those of] the Palestinian refugees."

Dallal, who also serves as national chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Jews in Arab lands committee, said the questionnaire is being circulated among some Canadian Jews of Iraqi origin.

The Iraqi Jewish community in Toronto numbers about 200 families, while Montreal is home to around 800 families. Both cities also host smaller communities of Jews from other Arab countries.

More than 125,000 Jews fled Iraq following creation of the State of Israel and "the government confiscated property from all of them," Dallal said.

"He gave me the impression that it's on the radar screen and it's something the prime minister [Ehud Barak] raised with the president [Bill Clinton]," he said. "The government appears to be carrying the ball on this."

Ronen said the work of the NGOs is important but that ultimately, Israel must make it part of any peace deal.

"Our position is that there has to be a serious effort to assess the claims and put forth a serious case on this issue and not simply use it as political reinforcement of Israel's position" regarding refugees, he said.

Sasson Meyer, a Toronto Jew originally from Baghdad, received the ICJAL questionnaire about a year ago. He hasn't filled it out and doubts he will.

Meyer doesn't believe the current effort will amount to much because he doesn't believe either the Palestinians or the Sephardim will receive anything.

"Everyone will say, 'forget it, we don't trust the figures,'" he said.

Whether or not restitution is ever paid, it's unlikely most of Canada's substantial Sephardi community will be affected. About 90 percent of Sephardi Jews living in Canada are of Moroccan origin, according to Eli Ben Chetrit, director of communications for the Communauté Sépharade du Québec. Montreal is home to about 25,000 Sephardim, while about 6,000 live in Toronto.

Events in Morocco differed substantially from those in other Arab countries. "The situation in Morocco was special. There were no expropriations" except for a few rare cases, said Ben Chetrit.

Maurice Benzacar, vice-president of the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Toronto, agreed. "We Moroccan Jews have nothing to do with any reparations or claims," he said.

"Moroccan Jews still live there and have good relations" with the Moroccan people and government.

Most of the compensation claims will likely be lodged by Jews from Iraq, Egypt, Yemen, Libya and Lebanon – "wherever Jews lived in Arab lands," said Leon Levy, president of the Sephardi Federation, an umbrella organization that includes 25 constituent groups.

"Close to one million Jews from Arab lands settled primarily in Israel, with no formal recompense for what they left behind. [The Palestinians] are looking for compensation for those who left Israel and became refugees in countries like Lebanon and Jordan.

"Those countries kept them as refugees and did nothing to help them. Now it's an issue at the peace table but our Jewish brethren lost more than they lost, personally and collectively."

ICJAL has been pursuing this issue for years, but "we're taking it to an international level," added Levy.

It appears President Clinton has been briefed on the issue. In a television interview in July, he told Israeli viewers that Arafat agreed at Camp David that Sephardi Jews should be compensated.

Given that peace negotiations do not involve Iraq, Libya, Lebanon, Yemen or any other countries that hosted large Jewish populations, "whatever comes will come from Uncle Sam," Levy said.

"The United States pays the bills. I have no hope that Egypt or Iraq will come up with restitution like Germany, Austria or Switzerland, which acknowledged [Jewish Holocaust] claims and are going to pay."

Jewish home for the aged opens doors in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The new Jewish home for the aged is now open, marking the completion of the final phase of Ottawa's Jewish Community Campus.

On Sept. 24, several hundred people attended the opening ceremony of The Joseph and Inez Zelikovitz Long-Term Care Centre. The state-of-the art facility, which includes the Bess and Moe Greenberg Family Hillel Lodge, will house 100 residents in a modern, home-like atmosphere.

Roger Greenberg, chair of the Community Development Campaign, reminded those present that six years ago, at the beginning of the capital campaign, the consultant hired to do a feasibility study had concluded that the community had the capacity to raise enough funds for either a new Jewish Community Centre or a new Hillel Lodge, but not both.

"Look what we have accomplished in the last six years," said Greenberg. "It's really unbelievable, and we should all be very proud of what we have achieved."

With the opening of the new Hillel Lodge, communal needs for all ages are located on one site. The Solway Jewish Community Centre, Jewish supplementary and day schools, the Tamir Foundation for developmentally challenged adults and most community organizations are all on the campus at Carling and Broadview avenues.

Stephen Greenberg, president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Va'ad Ha'Ir, likened the dream of the complete campus to the Zionist dream of Theodor Herzl.

"'If you will it, it is no dream,' said Herzl. While our dream wasn't as difficult to achieve as Herzl's," said Greenberg, "it was a huge undertaking. We have finally completed the realization of that dream ... it is a wonderful testament to the power of a shared dream."

MC Evelyn Greenberg introduced several dignitaries, noting that "literally hundreds of people have worked for years to make this happen ... our founders, our wise board members, our devoted auxiliaries, the families, the donors, staff, community leaders – all deserve accolades," she said.

In attendance were Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, members of federal and provincial parliament, local councillors and past Ottawa mayors Jacquelin Holzman and Jim Watson.

John Baird, minister of community and social services, brought greetings on behalf of Premier Mike Harris and the Ontario government. Regional chair Bob Chiarelli and acting mayor of Ottawa Allan Higdon congratulated the community on its achievement.

While the mezuzah was affixed to the doorpost by two of the lodge residents, the Beth Shalom Men's Choir, the Beth Shalom Youth Choir and the "Five Tenors" – cantors Yair Subar, Stephen Chaiet, Pinchus Levinson, Daniel Benlolo and David Aptowitzer – entertained.

The ceremony concluded with the cutting of the ribbon by Inez Zelikovitz and Bess Greenberg, two of the major contributors to the building campaign.

Eruv installation refused

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — No eruv that involves the installation of wiring on public property will be permitted in Outremont because it is illegal, says Mayor Jérôme Unterberg.

If wires are found they will be cut down, as they already have been on at least one street, he said.

Unterberg is sticking firmly by his administration's decision to not issue an "occupancy" permit to the city's mainly chassidic and haredi Jewish community because it says the the provincial Cities and Towns Act does not give municipalities the power to authorize religious use of public space.

He admitted that the law is not explicit on this matter. "But we cannot exceed the powers the act provides for," he said.

(Occupancy permits are normally issued on such occasions as when streets are reserved temporarily for parades, he said.)

The Jewish community, which numbers close to 4,000 or about 15 percent of the population, has protested that the city is being "discriminatory" and has engaged noted human rights lawyer Julius Grey to fight the issue in court, if necessary.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) have also asked Outremont to show tolerance.

Unterberg said other municipalities in the Montreal area may allow eruvs, but that does not mean it is legal. He said that he offered to get a declaratory judgment on the issue, but the Jewish community refused.

If this goes to court, he fears it will upset the harmony Outremont is trying to maintain between different religious groups.

Outremont mayor says it is illegal

Unterberg maintained that Outremont's decision is consistent with the Canadian and Quebec human rights charters' protection of religious freedom.

"Having an eruv may make the practice of religion simpler, but it is not necessary to fully respect all the Jewish regulations," said Unterberg, whose father is Jewish and whose late grandfather was a longtime CJC staff member.

"This does not in anyway infringe upon their religious freedom. They are not forced to do anything contrary to their laws."

An eruv is an area in which observant Jews can carry or push objects, like baby carriages or wheelchairs, on Shabbat and holidays. It is contained by a continuous border, which may consist of existing structures such as fences and telephone wires. These structures must be connected by wiring.

"We use something like fishing wire. It is very thin. No one would know it is there," said Alex Werzberger, president of the Coalition of Outremont Chassidic Organizations. Any wiring would be at least 12 to 15 feet above the ground so as not to interfere with the tallest trucks, he added.

Werzberger said there are eruvs in Montreal on either side of Outremont – in the Jeanne Mance area to the east and Côte des Neiges to the west – but it's unlikely anyone knows they are even there, except those Jews who rely on it.

"There's even an eruv in Westmount and I never heard anyone complain about it," he added.

Werzberger observed that there is no legal separation of church and state in Canada, and, in any event, Outremont uses public property for Christmas decorations, for instance. (Outremont also this year resisted a Quebec Human Rights Commission order to cease the prayer recited before council meetings.)

Vaad Hair official Saul Deitcher said there are eruvs in several other areas, including Côte St. Luc, Hampstead, St. Laurent and Dollard des Ormeaux.

The Outremont community would like to have an eruv bounded approximately by Côte Ste. Catherine, Ducharme, Pratt and Hutchison streets, Werzberger said, where "95 per cent" of the Orthodox live. He was not sure how much wiring would have to be installed to enclose this area.

He said the community approached the city almost four years ago about an eruv. "The issue was kicked back and forth" with no firm answer until last month when it became the subject of a heated city council meeting. About 50 opponents of the eruv came out.

"This is a manufactured issue. There seems to be a perception that the Jews are taking over, that they are creating a ghetto," Werzberger said. "This is discrimination that impedes on our quality of life."

Werzberger said that, although the wiring is unobtrusive, Jewish law requires that it have the approval of civic authorities.

Lawyer Grey said he would argue the case on constitutional grounds. "The charter guarantees freedom of religion as long as it does not impose too onerous a price on other people. The wiring used is virtually invisible… No price has to be paid by society."

Grey believes a Supreme Court decision may serve as a precedent to buttress his argument. In that case, the high court overturned a lower court decision that the city of Peterborough, Ont. had the right to prevent public messages from being posted on telephone poles and other public property. Freedom of expression must take precedence, the Supreme Court decided.

Unterberg said the council at that time approved it because no extra wiring was used; the boundary through Outremont consisted of the fence along the CPR train tracks.

Deitcher said that eruv was very short-lived because its size made it too impractical to maintain. An eruv must be checked weekly to ensure that it is intact.

The only Jewish Outremont councillor, Sydney Pfeiffer, a member of Unterberg's political party, said he is in favour of the eruv.

"My position is – why not have an eruv? There are eruvs all over the place.

"Why be an exception? It's not going to interfere with the public."

He thinks there is a lot of misunderstanding among residents about what an eruv is and some are bringing up specious arguments.

"The issue is being used as a lightning rod for other complaints. People are saying the Catholic religion has changed. Why can't you?"

Côte St. Luc Mayor Robert Libman, who is the BBC regional director, said eruv wires are "virtually imperceptible to the naked eye. It doesn't disturb or inconvenience a soul."

BBC League for Human Rights national chair Stephen Scheinberg sent a letter to Unterberg that reads, "Surely, Outremont has a moral obligation to accommodate the needs of thousands of its citizens, if it is at no inconvenience to others."

As for any objection on the grounds that government should not become involved in the religious domain, Scheinberg pointed out that in the United States "dozens of cities have established eruvs without controversy," despite the constitutional obligation of church-state separation.

CJC Quebec region president Dorothy Zalcman Howard also wants Outremont to reconsider. "We are disappointed the city has missed this simple opportunity to demonstrate its religious tolerance."

Pfeiffer thinks that when things die down, the city will come around. "When better heads prevail, I'm quietly confident council will take another look at this."

Human rights agenda still needs work, say experts

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec has made measurable progress on the human rights front since the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms was adopted 25 years ago, but the province's underprivileged have yet to really benefit from it, said the president of the Quebec Human Rights Commission (QHRC.)

"If you have no food on the table, human rights mean nothing," Claude Filion said at a workshop during the recent Plenary 2000 of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q).

Joining Filion on the panel, moderated by Dr. Victor Goldbloom, until last year Canada's Commissioner of Official Languages, were John Hucker, secretary-general of the Canadian Human Rights Commission; and Warren Allmand, president of the International Centre for Human Rights and Development.

Filion said the challenge for the future will include ensuring that all segments of society – including the poor – are embraced by the Quebec Charter.

He said the essence of the Quebec Charter, with its philosophical underpinnings found in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, lies in the concept of the "equality of all human beings" and the ideal of being able to "live together."

It should not be a matter of choosing to put food on the table or enjoying one's human rights, he said, since people need both, "rice and rights."

The uniqueness of the Quebec Charter, he said, is that it applies not only in regards to relations between citizens themselves, but between them and the state and private organizations.

Filion's commission makes about 1,000 inquiries annually, with many of its investigations related to issues of "economic and social rights," a primary aspect to the Quebec Charter. He said about one-third of its inquiries involve "public service bodies."

The commission's work includes public education and holding inquiries on issues ranging from race, religious beliefs and age, to sexual orientation, political beliefs and even pregnancy.

Hucker, who works for what he describes as a "complaints-taking agency," noted that when Quebecers think of a "rights charter," it's the Quebec one that springs to mind first, and not the Canadian charter.

He said that compared to 15 years ago, the Canadian commission has seen the issues change "subtly". Fewer cases involve "racism and sexism," he said.

Yet the concept of what constitutes "discrimination" has expanded to include older employees who are let go because they can't adapt to the latest technology, or the disabled who are not provided with adaptive systems at work, he said.

One point Hucker made was that while governments are now seen as supportive of human rights codes, this has not trickled down to bureaucratic levels, where "support is muted."

Like Filion, Hucker agreed that the issue of economic rights now "looms large" within his commission's work, as well as the need to strike balance between "political" and "social" rights.

One of the problems with the whole "rights" agenda, he said, is that the concept is sometimes difficult to define. "Lots of people invoke the term 'human rights,' " he said, but often such rights are "vague" and "amorphous."

Allmand said that human rights commissions, in general, lack the resources to do their jobs properly, and rights that do exist in the provincial and federal charters can often be overridden by the "notwithstanding clause."

He said that despite the position of the Quebec commission, Quebec courts have ruled that "social and economic rights are not the norm."

Allmand's suggestion was that Canada should follow the lead of Europe and international conventions in terms of entrenching, "social, economic and cultural rights."

"If we don't, we'll be left behind," he said.

Axworthy's parting blow

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

One of the recurrent themes that characterizes this weekly peek into federal politics has been the care the Jewish community must exercise in the choices it makes. Positions taken, decisions made and alliances forged always have consequences and always entail risks.

That is not to say that choices should be avoided. Only that they require careful consideration.

As attention within the Jewish community has been riveted to the developing chaos in the Middle East, Lloyd Axworthy offers a reminder of how long is the reach of a slighted politician.

The soon-to-be former foreign minister delivered a parting blow to the Jewish community in his unsolicited pronouncement on the Middle East crisis. In case you didn't catch it, Axworthy parroted the Palestinian view that the controversial Ariel Sharon and the Israeli police that protected him during a "walkabout" on the Temple Mount are responsible for the ensuing violence.

Now, your humble scribe is no expert on Middle East affairs but it is hard to see how one man's 30-minute presence on a particular piece of real estate should generate, thus far, more than a week of rioting and violence. Apparently, Lloyd Axworthy has better vision!

Friends at the Canada-Israel Committee tell us that plans for the violence were well under way even before Mr. Sharon announced his visit to the contentious shrine and that the subsequent escalation of the conflict fits a long-entrenched pattern, as the CIC puts it, of the PLO's "use of violence as a tool of diplomacy."

If that's the case, a veteran like Axworthy should be able to recognize the pattern. Perhaps he does, but simply chooses to ignore it. If so, here may be a reason why.

Axworthy is leaving politics. He is leaving because at this stage he understands that the position he truly covets – that of prime minister – is forever beyond his reach.

Some have suggested that Axworthy bears a smouldering grudge against the Jewish community for its unwillingness to support his aborted leadership bid first when Trudeau stepped down, and then when Turner was chased out of Ottawa.

Compound that with the flak he took for the Liberal position during the Gulf War and you have an inviting scapegoat for all his real or imagined failures.

Though allowing visible minorities into the country and stripping our immigration laws of their racist character had begun earlier under John Diefenbaker and Lester Pearson, it was the Trudeau administration which ultimately liberalized Canada's immigration laws. It was one of the objectives of his Just Society to move Canadian society ahead of its time, to make the world welcome in Canada and to elevate the country's ethnic communities on an equal pedestal with the English and the French. And he succeeded.

Perhaps his greatest success was the Canadian Jewish community. One anecdote says it all.

While attending a Jewish function in Montreal in the mid 1970s, Trudeau was approached by one of his constituents who congratulated him for appointing three Jews to his cabinet. The Prime Minister responded: "I did? Who are they?"

Apocryphal, perhaps, but nonetheless telling. It is clear that Trudeau believed in merit and was blind to race, religion, or colour. He was comfortable in surrounding himself with the best Canada had to offer, whether they were English, French, Jewish, Italian — indeed anyone with talent.

He was intolerant of intolerance and was gleeful in confounding conventional wisdom, bucking public opinion and refusing to pander to prejudice. He was determined to blast open sectors of Canadian society that for too long had been closed to Jews and others.

In the first 100 years of Canada's existence, no Jew had ever been appointed to the federal cabinet. Some had come close — the dynamic David Croll was shunted off to the Senate in 1950 rather than being given the cabinet appointment he so richly deserved.

But the moment he took office, in a decisive and symbolic break with Canadian tradition and custom, Trudeau appointed Herb Gray to his cabinet. Other Jews would soon follow: Jack Austin, Barney Danson and Robert Kaplan would serve in subsequent Trudeau cabinets.

> 'He was intolerant of intolerance'

There was more. Trudeau was determined to permanently demolish the wall of restrictions and practices that had barred Jews from public service. And he did it in the most triumphant way. He appointed Bora Laskin to the Supreme Court of Canada and shortly thereafter he made him Chief Justice of Canada. Strikingly, there has never been another Jew on the Supreme Court since. At the same time he appointed the country's first four Jewish provincial chief justices — Sam Freedman in Manitoba, Nathan Nemetz in British Columbia, Allan Gold in Quebec and Constance Glube in Nova Scotia.

It is clear that Trudeau delighted in blazing new paths and breaking down outworn barriers. His governments were full of bright, young Jewish men and women. Alan Gottlieb became the country's first Jewish under secretary of state for external affairs and later ambassador to the United States. Simon Reisman, Mickey Cohen, Bernard and Sylvia Ostry amongst others became deputy ministers of key departments. Martin Goldfarb, pollster extraordinaire, became one of Trudeau's trusted confidants as did Carl Goldenberg and Jerry Grafstein. And dozens of Jews took up senior positions in the public service and the judiciary.

While, like all Canadians, Jews benefited from other Trudeau initiatives such as the Charter of Rights, it was his multicultural policies which had a more immediate and dramatic impact.

For Trudeau, multiculturalism was a way of opening long-closed minds and reminding Canadians that theirs is not simply a country of two founding peoples, but that other groups have played a substantial role in the growth and development of Canada — a role that for too many years had been ignored.

As he put it: "There is no official culture, nor does any ethnic group take precedence over any other. No citizen or group of citizens is any other than Canadian and all should be treated fairly."

Trudeau believed that if the state respected people for who they were, they in turn would be loyal to the state. Trudeau's vision was of a Canadian identity based on cultural pluralism. He made the Canadian mosaic our national cliche, our single most important national characteristic.

Under his inspiration, diversity became a positive value in Canada and it made it easier and more acceptable for minority groups, such as Jews, to maintain a separate identity and even a separate culture.

Where everyone is a hyphenated Canadian, Jews do not stand out from others when they include the Jewish, as well as the Canadian element in their identity. Because most of the Jewish community consists of immigrants and their descendants, the encouragement of ethnic distinctiveness was crucial in creating an environment in which Jews can live comfortably as Jews while participating in all aspects of Canadian society.

Yet Trudeau's relationship with the Jewish community was not always smooth, and on occasion it was very rocky. Unlike some other prime ministers, Trudeau had little visceral attachment to Israel or the Holy Land. He was staunchly anti-nationalist both at home and abroad, and Zionism was foreign to him. He certainly was friendly to the Jewish state, but no more than was necessary for a member of parliament who represented the largest Jewish constituency in the country.

On several key issues involving Israel he was at odds with Jewish leadership. Despite an enormous lobbying campaign he refused to pass legislation forbidding Canadian firms to comply with the Arab boycott of Israel. Though the United States and even the government of Ontario had passed such legislation, Trudeau was adamant; there would be no anti-boycott laws passed by his government.

Throughout his tenure he seriously toyed with the idea of dealing with "responsible elements" of the PLO. And while he cancelled one United Nations conference in Canada because 'Relationship was not always smooth'

PLO representatives would be present, he allowed another one to take place, despite the vigorous protests of Jewish organizations.

Nor did Trudeau show much sympathy for the dissident movements in Eastern Europe, including Refuseniks in the Soviet Union. As his biographer ruefully comments: "Trudeau saw them as irresponsible agents of disorder who might disturb the world's delicate status quo."

But that was Trudeau — a man of contradictions, a champion of civil rights who imposed the War Measures Act, a staunch defender of human rights who opposed dissenters in the Soviet bloc.

It was the issue of Nazi war criminals in Canada that most infuriated the Jewish community. Despite the constant badgering of Jewish leaders and even from his own Solicitor-General Robert Kaplan, Trudeau refused to allow the prosecution of these alleged mass murderers. And he did so, he later explained, for the well-being of Canadian Jewry. As he told some astounded academics several years after he retired: "Going after war criminals would be bad for the Jews. It would create ethnic tensions, divide immigrant groups and weaken multiculturalism." He did allow the extradition of one war criminal to West Germany, but the thousands of others in Canada would not be disturbed.

Clearly Pierre Trudeau was a man of many facets. He appealed to the best in us, yet he did not always behave as we hoped. But his impact on his country was immeasurable. His Canada was a new and different Canada, a nation of decency and humanity, free of bigotry and parochialism, full of promise and hope for all of its peoples.

That he sometimes disappointed the Jewish community should not be a surprise nor should it detract from his singular contribution. He helped us take our proper place in Canadian society and for that we should be eternally grateful.

Clinton, Barak vow to restart peace talks

Ha'aretz Daily News Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak plans to continue efforts in upcoming weeks to reach a final status agreement with the Palestinians. He made the pledge after returning from a Paris summit to discuss the recent violence in Israel and the territories.

"Deciding that we have no partner for peace carries far-reaching consequences of deterioration and conflict. Therefore, it is vital that we act with great responsibility before arriving at that conclusion," Barak told reporters at a press conference last Thursday.

"Within a month we will know if we have a mature partner for peace, and whether a diplomatic breakthrough and agreement are within reach," he added.

U.S. President Bill Clinton invited the Palestinian and Israeli negotiating teams to come to Washington after Yom Kippur to continue the talks. The White House is working on a bridging proposal, which will outline the American positions on the final status arrangement and serve as a basis for the negotiations.

However, the administration has yet to decide if and when to submit the proposal to the two sides.

Israel blames Chirac for foiled deal

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel blamed France for the collapse of last week's talks with the Palestinians on a ceasefire to end the clashes in the territories.

"The French position did not help create the required atmosphere, and contributed to Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat's decision not to sign the agreement," said Danny Yatom, head of Prime Minister Ehud Barak's diplomatic-security office."

Late Wednesday night, Israeli and Palestinian leaders meeting in Paris reached a final draft of a ceasefire agreement, and told U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright – at least according to the Israeli version – that they were ready to sign.

Albright then traveled to the Elysée Palace to present the agreement to Chirac, saying that it focused on the security clauses but included no reference to the Palestinian demand for an international commission of inquiry to investigate the recent wave of violence.

Chirac was not happy. "A supreme effort must be made to include the commission of inquiry in the agreement, and we are willing to help," he said.

In light of this sudden show of support, Arafat firmly reiterated his demand for an international commission of inquiry.

At the conclusion of the meeting in the Elysée Palace, the sides returned to the U.S. ambassador's residence to sign the agreement. But while the Americans and Israelis showed up, as did Palestinian delegates Saeb Erekat and Nabil Sha'ath, there was no sign of Arafat.

Recent violence has strengthened Hamas

By DANIEL SOBELMAN and AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The strength of the radical Islamic organization Hamas seems to be growing both in the streets of the Palestinian Authority and in neighbouring Jordan.

In recent days, the Palestinian Authority released dozens of activists from Islamic Jihad and Hamas, mostly in Gaza. Most of these prisoners were not political activists but members of the military wing of the organizations and had been actively involved in the planning and execution of attacks against Israelis.

The IDF is concerned that the released prisoners may join the violence currently under way in the territories. Israel's Chief of Central Command Maj.-Gen. Yitzhak Eitan said that "the term 'revolving door' is no longer appropriate to describe the situation. The door has already collapsed and has been pulled off the hinges."

According to Eitan, the army has knowledge that Hamas plans to commit "strategic" strikes at Israeli targets, meaning mass terror attacks, both in the territories and inside the Green Line.

A source in intelligence said that "until now, Hamas has not been active during the demonstrations. Clearly [the releases] are an incentive for them to act. Otherwise, if the Tanzim (the paramilitary youth wing of the PLO) operate like Hezbollah, who needs Hamas?"

Eitan said that "this is the time for them to commence terror activities" in order to gain the support of the masses.

The recent wave of violence seems to have also boosted the position of Hamas in neighbouring Jordan. According to Foreign Ministry estimates, the current atmosphere there, where the Israeli Embassy has come under attack by demonstrators, may result in an attempt by Hamas leadership, expelled from the kingdom last year, to return and reassert their position.

According to an Israeli diplomatic source, Hamas currently "is the only voice on the street," even though the Jordanian authorities have not allowed the protests to get out of control.

• Media reported the results of a poll conducted by the American University in Beirut, which found that most Arabs in Syria, Lebanon and Jordan refuse to consider themselves bound by peace agreements with Israel.

Oct. 3

• The PA had assured Israel that Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount would not lead to violence. Acting Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami said the head of Palestinian security, Jibril Rajoub, told him that if Sharon stayed out of the mosques, the visit would pass peacefully.

• U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk, suspended from his post for alleged security breaches, was returned to duty by U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. She cited "compelling national interests," for doing this.

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak met with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright in Paris to end the violence between Israelis and Palestinians. The meeting ended without an agreement being signed but an apparent commitment to implement a ceasefire.

Oct. 5

• The number of Arab citizens of Israel killed in the week's violent demonstrations rose to 10 with the death of Mohammed Raleb Hameisi, 21, from the village of Kana.

Oct. 6

IDF Stronghold
Palestinian shooting

HOW A PALESTINIAN CHILD MET HIS DEATH: The Office of IDF spokesman produced the following aerial photo, which details the exchange of fire at the Netzarim junction in which a Palestinian child, Mohammed al-Durri was killed. The incident was telecast worldwide two weeks ago and brought down immediate condemnation upon Israel even though the circumstances of the incident were not known. The photo shows the location of the father and son as they took cover adjacent to a Palestinian shooting position at the junction.

The spokesman explained that Palestinian police fired from and around this position toward an IDF position opposite. IDF soldiers returned fire toward the sources of the shooting and during the exchanges of fire, the Palestinian child was apparently hit and killed.

It has still not been established whose bullets killed the boy. Nevertheless, the IDF expressed its sorrow at the death of the child and indeed for any occurence in which lives are lost, but also emphasized that the Palestinians make cynical use of children's lives by sending them to throw stones under the cover of Palestinian fire thus endangering the children's lives.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The New York Times is being accused of exhibiting bias against Israeli by misidentifying the contents of a photograph that showed an Israeli soldier standing near a bloodied youth.

The Times identified the victim as a young Palestinian who had been beaten and bloodied by the baton-carrying soldier on Jerusalem's Temple Mount. In reality, the youth was a Jewish yeshiva student from Chicago who, along with two friends, had been dragged from a cab in an Arab neighbourhood and severely beaten by a mob.

Akiva Medjuck, a 21-year-old Toronto native who is studying at Yeshivas Bais Yisrael in Jerusalem, said the victim is lucky to be alive after a mob beat him with their fists, feet and rocks.

Medjuck attends the same yeshiva and is a friend of the victim, 20-year-old Tuvia Grossman, He is angry at the Times for reprinting an AP photograph and mislabeling its contents.

The Times' caption, which painted the Israeli soldier as a villain, seems "almost premeditated" given that the original, uncropped photograph clearly shows a burning Magen David Adom ambulance in the background and a gas station, which could not be anywhere near the Temple Mount, Medjuck said in an interview from Jerusalem.

The photograph hurt Grossman's parents, who flew to Israel to be with their son, Medjuck added.

Medjuck pieced together the sequence of events, as related to him by Grossman and the two other victims:

The three yeshiva students hailed an Arab-owned cab to drive them to the Western Wall so they could "daven Minchah," the Jewish afternoon prayer, prior to sundown on the eve of Rosh Hashanah.

The cab driver, Medjuck said, took them on a circuitous route that traversed the Arab neighbourhood of Wadi Jaws, east of the Old City. Driving through the neighbourhood, the car was heavily stoned until a large rock "spidered" the front windshield.

At that point, Medjuck said, the cab driver jumped out of the car and ran. A mob pulled the three youths from the car and began pummelling them.

One youth escaped after slipping out of his jacket, which was being held by an assailant. A second was thrown down an embankment and stoned before he, too, ran away.

About 40 rioters set upon Grossman, who was at first hit and kicked. Then, Medjuck said, the rioters began striking his head with rocks and he was stabbed in the leg with a knife.

Grossman thought he was going to die and recited the Shmah, one of Judaism's most seminal prayers. He also let out a shriek that startled the mob and gave him a second in which to escape, Medjuck said.

Grossman doesn't remember much of what happened next, except that he spotted Israeli soldiers in a stronghold near a gas station. It was the Israeli soldier who came out to help him, Medjuck said, who was captured on film.

Grossman was admitted to hospital with five deep gashes on his head, a slight concussion and two stab wounds on his leg. He is suffering from severe headaches and shooting pains down his leg, but he is expected to recover.

"It's a miracle he's alive," said Medjuck.

The Times later published a small correction.

The case is being publicized on the Internet where the Times is being accused of biased and slanted coverage. Even a casual regard for the contents of the picture would have indicated the caption could not be true, Medjuck said.

By JOSEPH J. WILDER

Comment

Since the failure of the Camp David Summit in July, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak has been widely commended internationally for having shown maximum flexibility in his negotiations with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

U.S. President Bill Clinton, who hosted the summit, in fact publicly commented that Barak had shown more willingness to compromise than had Arafat. But even compromises have their limits, and for Israel one such limit, an absolute red line beyond which no Israeli leader can go, is the acceptance of the Palestinian's claim of a "right of return" to what is currently Israel.

The reason for Israel's position is at least twofold: existential and moral/historical. Existential because the influx to Israel of (potentially) millions of Palestinians to a country only about the size of Lake Ontario would spell the end of Israel as Jewish state. And moral/historical because, as Barak himself commented recently, while Israel regrets the suffering of the Palestinian people, it cannot accept responsibility for a tragedy brought on largely by the rejectionist policies of the Palestinian leadership more than 50 years ago and backed and acted upon by the surrounding Arab rulers.

The Palestinian and Arab rejection of the UN Partition Plan for Palestine in November 1947 (a plan which was accepted by the Jews), and the subsequent Arab invasion of Israel on May 15, 1948, the day after the state was declared, were the decisive historical events which led to the displacement of approximately 650,000 Palestinians.

This figure was exceeded by the number of Jews displaced about that time from the Arab world. Many of these Jews were immediately absorbed into the nascent Jewish state, while the displaced Palestinians were deliberately left to linger in refugee camps to be used as political pawns in the ongoing war against Israel, especially against its recognition and legitimacy. Israel's treatment of the Jewish refugees stands in marked contrast to the inhumane treatment the Palestinians received in Lebanon, where the government, even today, denies them citizenship and the right to employment.

To this day, the constant refrain of a "right of return" to what is now Israel, emanating not only from the original Palestinians but, two generations later, from their some 3.5 million descendants, amounts to a call for the elimination of Israel. Virtually all Israelis, on the Left as well as the Right, understand this fact and react appropriately.

For instance, Israeli author and peace activist Amos Oz wrote a much discussed article in the New York Times in late July in which he expressed bitter disappointment at Arafat's triumphalism and intransigence immediately following the collapse of the Camp David Summit.

Talking about Arafat's insistence on the Palestinian right of return, Oz stated: "... we all very well know that around here [the Middle East] 'right of return' is an Arab euphemism for the liquidation of Israel." Similar views have been expressed by Israeli Justice Minister Yossi Beilin, an architect of the Oslo Accords and a leading proponent of a just and fair resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Despite Palestinian insistence that the "right of return" is guaranteed by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and that it is an inalienable right enshrined in international law, this claim is not grounded in fact and is merely a rhetorical device.

Regarding the Universal Declaration, Israeli legal scholar Ruth Lapidoth has commented that the right of return established in the Declaration applies to individuals, not to masses, and only to those who were nationals and perhaps permanent residents of the state. Because the Palestinian refugees and displaced persons fled before the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948 or before the areas in which they lived were occupied by Israel in 1948 or 1967, they never had this status in Israel. Moreover, this right is subject to limitation when its exercise would violate the rights and freedoms of others and would damage public order and the general welfare in a democratic society.

Nor is the right of return an inalienable right enshrined in international law, as the Palestinians argue. Abba Eban, the veteran Israeli statesman who has long supported the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, has stated that "the very term 'right of return' has never featured in an international binding document... In December 1949, the General Assembly of the United Nations made a recommendation [emphasis added] about the return of refugees [Resolution 194] but this was described as a matter subject to 'permission,' not as a matter of 'right.'"

Resolution 194 states that the refugees "should be permitted" to return to their homes, but this permission is conditional upon their wish to return and their readiness to live at peace with their neighbours.

Eban, who was part of the Israeli delegation at the UN in those early days, also pointed out that on Feb. 24, 1947, "the permanent members of the Security Council determined that a General Assembly resolution does not create international obligations. All the Arab states concurred in this finding."

Unfortunately, these facts of international law have had virtually no impact on informing the discussion in the West about the solution to the refugees' plight because the chorus of those affirming a "right of return" has been so overwhelming as to drown out any other voice.

Some now argue that in order to placate Palestinian grievances, Israel should be forthcoming and despite the above facts give formal (de jure) recognition to a right of return in exchange for a Palestinian de facto concession to not seek the actual implementation of such a "right."

However, what would prevent the Palestinians from recanting on the concession and demanding the actual implementation of a right enshrined in law?

Where would Canada (as gavel-holder for the Multilateral Working Group on Middle East Refugees) and the international community in general then stand?

Israel simply cannot take such a risk, nor should it be expected to, because as we have seen, it was not responsible for the creation of the refugee problem in the first place.

If the international community persists, against all these reasons, in affirming a Palestinian "right of return," it should consider one further point: Israel, among all democracies, is being expected to enact a principle that other countries reject for themselves.

For instance, the Czech Republic has expressed regret for the plight of Sudeten Germans expelled from Czechoslovakia after World War II, but does not accept their "right" to return. The constitution of India, the world's largest democracy, explicitly forbids the "right" of millions of Muslim refugees fleeing the Indian civil war of 1947-48 to return from Pakistan and Bangladesh. The same applies to the Turkish and Greek communities of Cyprus, and there are many other examples.

Only in Israel's case is this "right" asserted. And one reason, of course, is that among the tens of millions of refugees that were created worldwide in the late '40s and early '50s, only the Palestinians were not allowed (except in the case of Jordan) to resettle in those countries to which they fled.

Instead, they were consigned to refugee camps and maintained in them with the active assistance of the United Nationals Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA) – the only UN agency established for the specific purpose of providing assistance to a specific refugee group.

None of these considerations, however, should make Israelis callous to the humanitarian dimension of the Palestinian refugee issue. And indeed, on this score, the Israelis have indicated considerable preparedness to provide humanitarian relief to individual refugees through limited family reunification, and to contribute to international programs to compensate the refugees as a group.

Much can be done, but not until the international community at last properly understands the legal limits of Israel's responsibilities, and the historical and moral obligation of the Palestinians and Arabs themselves.

Katsav: Riots have brought Israelis closer

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Recent events have helped reduce the divisions that exist in Israeli society, said President Moshe Katsav last week, referring to the violent clashes in Israel and the territories.

The riots in the territories and across the country have helped to somewhat reduce political divisions between Israelis, Katsav said, adding that the citizens of Israel are now relating differently to the situation in the Middle East because of these recent developments.

Lessons must be learned from these events, the president said.

Not all of the Arab population participated in the riots, he said, and those who did were incited by people who wished to fan the flames.

He said the Jewish people had never dared to damage the religious property of their neighbours.

There is now full freedom of worship in the area, something which did not exist in the distant past, he pointed out.

The controversial visit to the Temple Mount by Likud chair Ariel Sharon was not the cause of the riots, Katsav said, adding that some people are constantly searching for ways to incite the whole Islamic world against Israel.

"The displays of furor by the Arab sector in Israel are not in any way connected to the problems put forward by the leaders of the Arab sector, such as the existence of serious discrimination in the quality of life between Jews and Arabs in the State of Israel." Olmert said.

Extremists co-ordinate activities

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – The leaders of Hezbollah, Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Ahmed Jibril's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine met in recent days to co-ordinate their positions and actions regarding the violence in Israel and the occupied territories.

According to the Lebanese daily al-Mustakbal, the four organizations have held several coordination meetings and set up a joint "operations room" to monitor the developments in the territories.

Hamas leaders visit Tehran

The report came the day after Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister Mohammed Sader "did not rule out" that Iran was helping to co-ordinate the activities of the four rejectionist groups.

"We support the liberation of Palestinian lands, and it is only natural that we support any team working in that direction," Sader said in an interview with the al-Hayat newspaper.

A delegation of Hamas leaders visited Tehran last week and met with Ayatollah Ali Khameini and other senior Iranian officials.

The Israeli defence establishment has long been warning of the rejectionist organizations' plans to operate against Israeli targets both locally and overseas. One belief is that this co-ordination is being overseen by Imad Maghniyah of Hezbollah, who is in charge of the group's overseas attacks.

Mideast music event postponed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The National Arts Centre Orchestra (NACO) has indefinitely postponed a unique educational program that would have brought together young Israeli, Palestinian and Canadian musicians on the Internet.

In addition, a NACO appearance at the music conservatory in Ramallah, which is located within the Palestinian Authority, was cancelled.

Ongoing violence and the uncertain security situation were the reasons given by organizers in announcing the postponement of the Internet conference and the cancellation in Ramallah. Two concerts in Tel Aviv, followed by a third in Amman, Jordan, will, however, go ahead as scheduled, said Kelly Beaton, NAC communications director.

The concerts are part of the orchestra's eight-country, 16-concert international tour that will see the ensemble visit Germany, Switzerland, Italy, France,England and Scotland. Both concerts in Tel Aviv's Frederic Mann Auditorium are completely sold out while tickets for the Amman concert at the University of Jordan were expected to be sold out, she said.

The Mideast portion of the tour was to include a "Web cast" led by NACO music director Pinchas Zukerman from Tel Aviv. Called "Dialogue Through Music," the learning session was originally scheduled for Wednesday, Oct. 4, and would have brought together Israelis in Tel Aviv, Palestinians in Jerusalem and Canadians in Ottawa – albeit over the Internet.

The National Research Council and the Communications Research Centre were to provide the technical expertise by linking three groups of 10 high school students through a videoconference over broadband Internet connections.

Using live video, Zukerman, who is originally from Israel, was to lead them in interpreting Beethoven's Ode to Joy.

"After detailed consultations with all our partners, it became clear that it is in the best interests of all the participating children that this educational event be postponed until conditions in the region improve," said Chris Deacon, NACO managing director, from Tel Aviv.

Church document misinterpreted: Pope

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Pope John Paul II is trying to patch up strained relations with other religious leaders after a controversial Vatican document rejected the idea that other religions could be equal to Roman Catholicism.

Clearly concerned that the negative reaction to last month's document could take a heavy toll on the course of interfaith dialogue, the Pope devoted much of his weekly Sunday address to the faithful to damage control.

The pontiff reaffirmed his support for the Sept. 5 document, issued by the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, but said there had been "many wrong interpretations" of it. He said he hoped "misunderstandings" could be overcome.

The document repeated Roman Catholic Church teachings that non-Christians are in a "gravely deficient situation" regarding salvation and that other Christian churches have "defects."

But the Pope said it is wrong to interpret the document to mean that non-Christians are denied salvation. It had not been intended, he added, to express "arrogance which shows contempt for other religions."

In fact, the Pope said, the Vatican had been trying to help the process of interfaith dialogue by "clarifying essential Christian elements" in order to lay firm foundations for interreligious contacts.

"Dialogue without foundations," he said, "would be destined to degenerate into empty verbosity."

Protest over the document's contents was one reason why Rome Jewish leaders pulled out of a Catholic-Jewish dialogue seminar which had been scheduled for last week.

But the document provoked an outcry from Protestant leaders, as well as from Jews.

Other Christian leaders, in fact, were especially bitter, as the document seemed to imply that Roman Catholicism is the only true form of Christianity.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, leader of the world's 70 million Anglicans, was particularly vocal in branding this position as unacceptable.

Post-partum depression common, says specialist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Post-partum depression is one of the most common complications of childbirth and it must be taken seriously, says a specialist in perinatal mood disorders.

When the "baby blues" – which affects about 78 percent of all women within three days after childbirth – goes beyond being weepy, exhausted and irritable, says Marci Starkman, "that is when we have to suspect PPD."

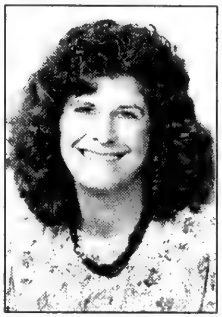
Starkman, who offers counselling and support groups for women with PPD, says the recent death of Dr. Suzanne Killinger-Johnson, who jumped in front of a subway with her infant son, "was a painful reminder that PPD is not selective as to whom it strikes, in terms of race, age, religion, employment status or finances. She was a doctor who lived in a beautiful home, and that became sensationalized."

PPD, says Starkman, "strikes 10 to 20 percent of all women after childbirth, and in one to two percent of the cases, women, such as Killinger-Johnson become psychotic."

Not only does PPD affect women who have had babies, she says, but it can also affect women after a miscarriage, abortion or even after adoption – "anything that has to do with hormones."

Killinger-Johnson was not a murderer, says Starkman. "She did not deliberately kill her baby. Nobody knows what was going on … and we may never know the circumstances or feelings that precipitated her desperate leap."

Starkman began seeing women with PPD about five years ago when she was working as a home care nurse. "I could see that a lot of the moms were sleep deprived, and were having a hard time coping, she says.



Marci Starkman

"They may have held high-pressured jobs, but at home they could not even handle the laundry. They couldn't get things together to wash the dishes. They were going through a huge adjustment, and they had a lot of mixed-up feelings."

When she visits the home, says Starkman, she studies how the mother interacts with her baby. "Does she cuddle it? Does she get visibly upset when the baby cries? Sometimes, it's just a bad fit – a calm mom with a hyper baby; when the baby cannot be soothed, she becomes frustrated.

"She may feel guilty about breastfeeding, which is really not for every mother, or else she might be exhausted. When I hear a woman say 'I don't know myself any more,' my antenna goes up."

Starkman also works with the rest of the family, she says, "because when the thumb hurts, the whole hand hurts. When mom feels better, the whole hand feels better."

What is most rewarding about working with mothers who have PPD, she says, is that "they are desperate to get better. They try whatever I suggest, and they are hopeful that things will change."

Starkman worries about "what I think might be eight percent of the women who do not seek help," she says. "As long as depression is classed as a mental illness, they will not come out of the closet.

"There is a stigma attached to mental illness, and some women fear that their baby will be taken away if they talk about it. It's a real conundrum. The longer they wait, the sicker they get."

Many doctors know nothing about PPD, she says, and don't know what medications to prescribe. "There are medications women can take while they breastfeed that may help them feel better. These women also need to realize that they are not alone, it's not their fault, and with counselling and medication, they can get better."

New chair established for aging brain research

TORONTO — Dr. Donald Stuss is the first Reva James Leeds Chair in Neuroscience and Research Leadership at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the University of Toronto. The joint position was established as a result of matching gifts from Toronto philanthropist Reva James Leeds and the Baycrest Centre Foundation.

Stuss, founding director of the Roman Research Institute and vice-president of research at Baycrest, is a clinical neuropsychologist and a professor in the departments of medicine, psychology and rehabilitation sciences at the University of Toronto.

As the new chair, Stuss will be based at Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute. His primary focus will be to understand changes that occur to the brain during normal aging and in the presence of conditions such as Alzheimer's disease, depression and stroke.

Stuss has achieved worldwide recognition for his work in the understanding of the brain's frontal lobes. He is in constant demand in the international forum to describe his findings on the effects of traumatic brain injury on cognitive performance. In his capacity as director of the Rotman Institute, Stuss has been the instrument that has led to its recognition as one of the topmost cognitive research programs in the world.

Kindertransport was a personal journey for producer

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The death of her mother, a kindertransport child, inspired Deborah Oppenheimer to make a film that profoundly changed her life.

"It has given me depth, brought some wonderful people into my life, and given me a greater appreciation of the Holocaust," she said in a recent interview.

Her splendid documentary, Into The Arms of Strangers: Stories of the Kindertransport, has garnered rave reviews since its screening at the Toronto International Film Festival last month.

Distributed by Warner Brothers, it poignantly tells the story of 10,000 Jewish children from Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia evacuated to Britain for their safety in a nine-month period before the outbreak of World War II in 1939. Tragically, few of the kinder were reunited with their parents, who perished in the Holocaust.

"This film is about love, loss, survival and memory," said Oppenheimer, the film's producer and a high-powered Hollywood television executive.

But, as she pointed out, she did not begin work on it until her mother, Sylva Avramovici Oppenheimer, passed away in 1998.

"I knew fragments of my mother's story, but we never discussed the subject in the house. My mother was of a generation in which you didn't air your problems. You kept your suffering very private.

"She wanted to put the past behind her. I tried to ask questions, but she would start crying, then I would start crying, and I would retreat for fear of causing her pain.

"I always had a sense that if I asked her about her experiences, I would open a Pandora's box that neither she nor I had the tools to close back up again. And I couldn't bear to do it. But thoughts about the kindertransport never left my mind."

Deborah Oppenheimer

With her mother's death, she felt free to proceed. "I started out making the movie as a tribute to her and for people who had never heard of the kindertransport," explained Oppenheimer, the producer of the ABC-TV comedy series, The Drew Carey Show.

"I wanted to understand what had happened. I wanted to raise the questions, 'Could you send your child away? Would you take a child in?'"

Oppenheimer, single and based in Los Angeles, began to delve into her family's past by reading a stack of correspondence between her mother and grandparents, Avraham and Alta Basia Rosen, who were deported from Chemnitz, Germany in May 1942.

Oppenheimer's father, Erich, a German Jew who had immigrated to the United States in 1938, found the letters after his wife died.

The correspondence yielded a bounty of leads, prompting Oppenheimer to travel to Chemnitz, her mother's birthplace, to several concentration camps, notably Auschwitz/Birkenau, Sachsenhausen and Theresienstadt, and to Berlin, Prague and Budapest.

As a result of her investigation, she learned that her mother had left Chemnitz in August 1939, at age 11, about a month before the war broke out, and that she had lived in a stately home in Britain called Cockley Cley.

In 1947, she arrived in New York City, where Oppenheimer and her two siblings were born, and lived there for the rest of her life.

Sylva Abramovici's defining experiences in Germany and Britain led her to embrace Judaism as a rock-solid source of comfort. "We were a traditional Jewish family," said Oppenheimer, who recently joined a Conservative synagogue in Los Angeles.

For all the hoopla it has generated, Into The Arms Of Strangers, written and directed by Mark Jonathan Harris, is not the first American documentary about the kindertransport. Two years ago, Melissa Hacker's My Knees Were Jumping: Remembering the Kindertransports had a limited theatrical run and was later broadcast on PBS in the United States.

Into The Arms Of Strangers, however, marks the first time that Warner Brothers, a major film studio, has released a documentary touching on the Holocaust.

The Warner executives to which Oppenheimer offered the film were immediately struck by its theme. "But it was still a big decision for them to green-light it," she noted.

A crisis ensued when Oppenheimer's financing dried up shortly after production got under way. With the blessing of Time Warner's chair, Gerald Levin, Warner Brothers came through with enough funds for Oppenheimer to finish the film. "It was a leap of faith," she said of her backers.

"A lot of favours were called in. People worked out of their homes, and a lot of people didn't take a salary."

She said the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation, and the Yad Vashem Holocaust museum in Jerusalem were extremely helpful in providing advice, historical material and archival footage.

Using the personal memoirs, transcripts and testimonies she had accumulated, she compiled a potential list of kinder who would appear in the film.

Looking back at the trials and tribulations she endured in the making of Into The Arms Of Strangers, Oppenheimer is thrilled to have been associated with it.

Most people don't ever get to do something like this in their life," she said. "I'm lucky to have been part of it."

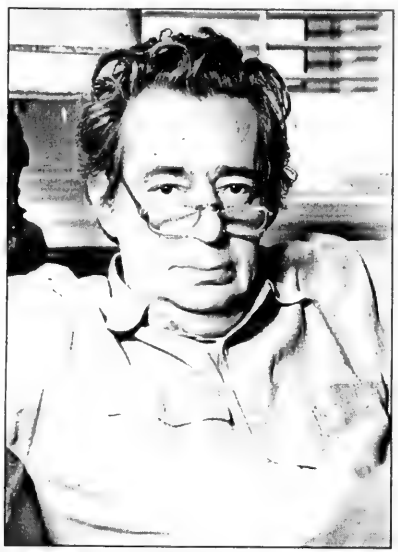
RICHLER TO BE FETED AT AUTHORS FEST

The 21st International Festival of Authors opens Wednesday Oct. 18 at Harbourfront with an evening tribute to writer Mordecai Richler. John Fraser, Barbara Gowdy, Peter Gzowski, Ted Kotcheff, Guy Vanderhaeghe and others celebrate the many accomplishments of the famed Montreal-based essayist, journalist and author.



Mordecai Richler

As many of his loyal readers know, Richler writes a weekly column for the National Post, and recently penned a profile of the late Pierre Elliott Trudeau for Saturday Night magazine, which comes with the Post on Saturdays.

All these Post connections notwithstanding, the Globe and Mail recently signed a multi-year agreement to be an official sponsor of the Harbourfront Authors Festival, as a means of enhancing the paper's reputation as "the book-lover's paper of choice in Canada," as Globe publisher-CEO Phillip Crawley put it.

Unlike previous years, there are no Israeli authors at this year's fest, and apparently no strongly "Jewish" books being spotlighted. The possible exception is German author Peter Schneider, who has written on Germany and the Holocaust, and whose latest novel, Eduard's Homecoming, explores life in post-unification Berlin.

As usual, however, there is an astonishing wealth of Jewish talent assimilated into the literary lineup of more than 100 authors from around the world. The "people of the book" seem especially well-represented in the stage discussions known as "dialogues."

Perhaps the biggest name in the festival is J.K. Rowling, creator of the Harry Potter phenomenon, who is to read in the SkyDome along with Canadians Kenneth Oppel and Tim Wynne-Jones. Margaret Atwood reads from her latest novel, The Blind Assassin, to close the festival on Oct. 28.

This is just a sampling of the riches being offered. For details and tickets, phone 416-973-4000 or visit the Web site www.readings.org.

Klezmer mixes nostalgic themes and exotic rhythms

BY BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Klezmer, from the Hebrew words kley (instrument) and zemer (song), is by nature exotic. It brings together the music of many places: Ukraine, Romania, Poland, Spain, Portugal, North Africa, Turkey and the eastern Mediterranean.

It is played by an itinerant ensemble of instruments that includes the fiddle, accordion, trombone, double bass, clarinet, mandolin, drum and tambourine. The sound can be so startlingly original, so unlike a traditional orchestra, that the clarinet seems to be laughing. But at times the music is so poignant and sad that the fiddle seems to cry.

Winnipeg-based Finjan's Dancing on Water is included on A Jewish Odyssey, a new CD offering a diverse anthology of klezmer sounds.

Major and minor scales play tug-of-war in klezmer, as do languages such as Yiddish, Hebrew, Ladino, Spanish and English. In one song, the lyrics seem light and irreverent; in another, they're sensual and poetic; and in a third they're deeply spiritual, cleaving to the holy Torah. Nostalgic themes are as common as the exotic rhythms.

A Jewish Odyssey, a new CD produced by the American company Putumayo World Music, offers a pleasing and diverse anthology of klezmer sounds. The first of its 11 tracks is Di Goldene Pave, (The Golden Peacock), sung by Israeli singer Chava Alberstein and backed by the Klezmatics, a top American klezmer band; she adapted the lyrics from a Yiddish poem by Anna Margolin.

Other familiar names include the Klezmer Conservatory Band, performing Meron Nign, an old European klezmer melody associated with a mystical chassidic circle in Sefat; the late Israeli singer Ofra Haza, singing Rachamim, a contemporary love song; and the Winnipeg-based band Finjan, performing Dancing on Water, a tune inspired by a brief melody retrieved from a 1910 klezmer recording. (Much of this information comes courtesy of the extensive liner notes.)

The artists are of diverse nationalities. Fortuna, a folksinger from Brazil, gives us a fine rendition of the traditional Hebrew song Shalom Aleichem. KlezRoym, an Italian ensemble, offers Fel Shara, a Sephardic love song. Also among the performers are The Burning Bush from Britain, Janet and Jak Esim from Turkey, and Consuelo Luz from Chile and Cuba.

Putumayo seems to specialize in CDs of soulful, funky and colourful music from the four corners of the world. Its backlist includes CDs of South African, Caribbean, Louisiana, Celtic and other lively world music.

Right down to the attractive cover art, A Jewish Odyssey seems to fit this formula splendidly. The appeal of the music seems to grow upon each hearing.

The astonishing synagogue of Tunis

By BARBARA KINGSTONE
Special to the CJN

TUNIS — My first stop to get permission to enter The Grand Synagogue in Tunis is at the kosher butcher shop facing this monumental building on Avenue de la Liberté.

Somehow, in retrospect, this doesn't seem too odd, since there's a unique sense of camaraderie and sharing which I sensed while travelling throughout the country.

But today, the man sitting in the small store surrounded by meat in a glass display case, and hanging from hooks, doesn't have the key.

"Try the Rabbinate," he tells me, my guide, Ihsen, translating. In Tunisia, they speak Arabic and French. I don't do too well in the latter, and the former is non-existent in my vocabulary.

Down a laneway, past a café behind the synagogue, is a large, tired-looking building in need of repair. It houses the offices for the rabbi and Jewish community needs. The space was once used as a Hebrew school. Today, there isn't one.

The few Jewish families who have chosen to remain in this North African country, with a population that is 97 percent Muslim, have private Hebrew teachers for their children.

After climbing two flights of stairs, we meet the rabbi's assistant. He tells me Rabbi Haim Madar, the former rabbi of the synagogue in Djerba, has been in Tunis for 12 years.

Rabbi Madar is in another room and can't be disturbed. However, I get permission to tour the well-secured synagogue.

To show us around, we are introduced to Marcelle, an ebullient woman who has been the secretary at the Rabbinate for more than 30 years. Leaving this building, we cross the narrow lane and enter the synagogue through the rear door.

It's the entrance used for Tunisian Jews who come twice daily to pray and form the minyan. I'm surprised to learn that this has not been a problem for the ever-diminishing Jewish population.

The once-thriving Tunisian Jewish community, with one of the most extensive Jewish histories, had approximately 167,000 Jews. But that has dwindled to a mere 3,000, with 1,000 living in Tunis. The others have chosen to remain in Djerba, a small island off the southern coast, and the coastal city of Zarzis.

We head down a series of dark staircases and enter a small chapel. "This isn't the synagogue. We use this room only for small gatherings," Marcelle tells me when she sees I'm preparing to take pictures.

Photos are not permitted outside, where there are security guards to emphasize this prohibition. Inside, however, it isn't a problem.

Through another door, we enter the astonishingly beautiful sanctuary of the synagogue. In 1879, Bey Mohammed Es-Sadok donated 1,000 square metres to the Jewish community for the site of The Grand Synagogue.

Recently renovated, the use of its original coloration – bright blue, orange, gold and white – is unusual for most solemn interiors. Geometric shapes merge with curved designs on the walls, over the arches and on the high dome above us.

Behind a small brass gate featuring a Magen David are the Sifrei Torah, which go back "many hundreds of years." Missing, though, are the multitudes of chandeliers, hanging lanterns which often decorate Sephardic North African synagogues. Softer, discrete illumination has been incorporated.

However, today being a bright and sunny day, I realize the lack of lighting must have to do with the brightness, which floods in from the stained glass windows in the ceiling, in this city with balmy, clear weather.

A very large, prominent Magen David is placed in front of one of these colourful windows, again creating a marvellous sense of grandeur and casting exquisite shadows on the already majestic architecture.

When there was a large population, women, in traditional Orthodox fashion, sat in the balcony upstairs. But now that the area is unused, the main aisle separates the sexes.

Something is missing. Where is the bimah, I ask Marcelle. It seems odd that there isn't one, which is usually placed in front of the Heikhal, the cabinet for the Holy Scrolls.

"It's movable, so we've put it over to the side for the time being," she tells me. The wooden bimah is less showy than I would expect in this exceptionally large and colourful area.

Another interesting note is that dozens of plaques dedicated to prominent deceased members hang at eye-level wherever there is a space on the wall. Names such as Cohen, Perez, Salomon, Bellity and Liscia are represented.

Asked about bar mitzvahs, Marcelle's happy demeanor disappears. "So many families have left. They have the celebration where they now live," she says.

However, a few marriages still take place. That has to do with the fact that most of these occasions happen in the summer months and "it's a good reason for families and former residents to come back for a visit, and to celebrate and have a vacation, too," she adds.

The large front doors are locked. Only on High Holy Days do they open. So, as we say our goodbyes, Marcelle gives us the option of exiting from the grand doorway, with traditional large, dark nail heads on azure blue paint. This would mean getting the security guard to open the entrance.

But we decide to leave as we came. Outside, I walk to the front and admire this imposing building, with its sparkling white façade and huge yellow Magen David prominently and proudly displayed over the doorway, near the dome.

This leaves me with the impression that the Jews of Tunis and Tunisia still have a presence which, although small, is reminiscent of a long and fine past in North Africa.

Born in Israel a big hit

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel and the Diaspora need each other, the co-leader of the music group Born in Israel recently told a sold-out audience.

Yet while Israelis feel jealous of the material possessions of North American Jews, the latter feel jealous of what the Israelis have accomplished, Ehud Manor added.

"My aunt and uncle went straight to the Bronx [from Europe] and for a long time there was tension between us, but it ended when they made aliyah and settled on the Mediterranean," said Manor, an Israeli icon of popular culture.

Born in Israel, winding up their North American, 13-city tour, gave a smashing concert at Leah Posluns Theatre, under the sponsorship of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation (CICF).

The place was jumping when co-leader Hanan Yovel and singer/actress Brynalee Furstenberg, together with Yovel's daughter Shira and Manor's son Yehuda, gave up-tempo renditions of Hebrew and English classics.

Highlights of the evening included 18-year-old Shira's weaving to every beat, and the all-out rendition by Furstenberg of the classic Jacques Brel number, Sons Of, and her singing of This Land is My Land.

Giving brief but pungent commentaries before each number, Manor said many of his songs were inspired by the memory of his brother who died in action at the Suez Canal

Manor said Furstenberg, born in Los Angeles, "the biggest kibitz of all," had met her Israeli soldier husband there and followed him to Israel. Their marriage only lasted three years, "but she is happily married now to her drama teacher and they have two children."

The songs of George Gershwin (Jacob Gershowitz) and Irving Berlin have inspired him, Manor said.

The Gershwin song It Ain't Necessarily So from Porgy and Bess "is a chassidic melody, pure and simple You can't get any more Jewish than that," he said.

"Our genes are the same as the North American Jews', but when we [Israelis] talk, because of our accents – oy vey!"

Though he considers his generation "failed" Israel because it has not been able to bring peace to the country, he said he believes the next generation will achieve it.

Meir Romem, Israel consul general in Toronto lamented the recent death of Israeli poet Yehuda Amichai, when he and Ronald Bresler, CICF national president, opened the evening.

Israeli kayaker wins 'heavy' medal in Sydney

CJN News Services

SYDNEY — Kayaker Michael "Mischa" Kalganov lived up to his billing as Israel's top medal prospect at the Sydney Olympics by delivering the medal – a bronze – on the final day of competition.

His victory boosted the number of Olympic medals won by Jewish athletes to five. Other winners included Masha Mazina, a Russian who is a member of a Maccabee club, who won a team gold medal in fencing while U.S. swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg won three gold medals.

With so many close calls in various events throughout the two weeks, the weight of Israel's expectations all fell on Kalganov's broad shoulders. As the end of the games drew near, he knew he was the only remaining medal prospect.

A man of few words, who did not talk to the press from the moment of his arrival in Sydney on Sept. 3, Kalganov's only post-medal comment was, "This medal is heavy, that's all I can say."

Kalganov awoke at 5:15 a.m. local time – the second day of Rosh Hashanah – and with hardly anything to eat the entire day, he warmed up and waited, warmed up some more and waited some more until the eventual 3:18 p.m. starting signal was given.

On the previous day, he started his push for the finish line too late, missing the bronze medal in the 1,000 metres by 42/1000s of a second. But this time there would be no mistake.

With a strong head wind, Kalganov set off at a furious pace and built up a lead of more than a length over his rivals. He held the lead for 470 metres before the wind got the better of him and Norwegian Knut Holman, who also won the 1000-metre gold, came through to win, followed by Petar Markov of Bulgaria for the silver.

The two, in the third and fourth lanes respectively, had the advantage of being shielded from the wind by the grandstand. Kalganov, racing in lane eight, was subjected to the full force of the wind, particularly in the closing stages. In the end, Markov trailed Holman by 546/1000s of a second, with Kalganov 1.716 seconds behind the Norwegian.

Some 20 minutes after the race, Kalganov finally broke his silence: "I dreamed of winning. No sportsman thinks of finishing in third position, he dreams of first place. I cannot yet take it all in, I haven't had time to think and I'm not even happy yet. It could have been better."

Michael "Mischa" Kalganov

Kalganov, a member of Kibbutz Degania B also said he had never had to compete in such conditions but said he dedicated his medal to the citizens of the Jordan Valley. He trains on the Kinneret.

A while after the race, once he had been through a drug test, Kalganov had this to say: "I am happy now, I'm getting used to the idea. It's the first time here that a competitor from an outside lane has finished in the top three."

Kalganov's coach, Danny Miroshinsky, was also disappointed at first. "It's a pity," he said. "He could have been the champion, but the wind killed his chances." But after talking to Kalganov, he too was a little more thankful.

"Thank God. If he'd managed to hold the same pace for another 50 metres he would have won. It's a very auspicious achievement. He kept to his plan and it all went well," he said.

Gili Lustig, head of Israel's Elite Sports Unit, and delegation head Ephraim Zinger, hugged each other after the race. Well before the games, Lustig had predicted that several Israelis would make it to the finals and win as many as three medals. He maintained, however, that Kalganov was the number one prospect and he was finally proved right. "Mischa has proved that he is our top sportsman. Yesterday he came close, but today he delivered," Lustig said.

"Yes, I was under immense pressure. Every day I saw our medal prospects go out and come back empty-handed. They told me I was the last chance, but even if they hadn't, I realized it. It was all the harder after missing out by 42/1000s yesterday," Kalganov said.

Pole vaulter Alex Averbukh, another candidate for an Israeli medal, failed to clear a relatively easy height of 5.70 metres and ended up in 10th spot in the final.

Averbukh easily cleared his opening height of 5.50 metres, but 5.70 metres, a height he had cleared with ease in recent competitions, proved an insurmountable hurdle this time.

The event produced a surprise winner in the shape of American Nick Hysong, who cleared a height of 5.90 metres.

Despite all the criticism and disappointment, the Israeli delegation to the Sydney Olympics has been the most successful of all time.

Eight representatives reached the finals of their events (places 1-8) as opposed to four in Atlanta and five in Barcelona. Kalganov earned Israel a medal for the third Games in a row. Kalganov's medal lifts Israel's overall Olympic medal tally to four – a silver for Yael Arad and a bronze for Oren Smadja for judo in Barcelona, Spain, in 1992, and a bronze for windsurfing to Gal Friedman in Atlanta in 1996.

But despite the good results, there were disappointments. Sailors Shani Kedmi and Anat Fabrikant, wrestler Yuri Ivseichik, judoka Arik Ze'evi and high jumper Constantin Matusevich each just missed out on medals.

In other sports developments, three Israeli athletes originally scheduled to take part in the grand prix finals in Qatar will not take part for security reasons.

Averbukh, Matusevich and Rogel Nahum all qualified for the finals after finishing in the top eight in the world in their respective events throughout the season.

The uneasy situation began before the Olympics when the Qataris took their time over issuing visas, but the final decision was taken last week when the Qataris refused permission for security personnel to join the three athletes.

The decision to prevent the athletes from travelling to Qatar has caused concern among local judo officials as the world under-20 championships are due to take place in Tunis at the end of October.

Seven Israelis are due to participate in the event but visas have not yet been issued and the judo association has decided to approach the world and European bodies to investigate the situation.

Israeli firm supplies high-tech FX for Olympic telecasts

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel did not break any world records at the Sydney Olympics, but an Israeli company was first in providing the technology that allowed TV viewers to see more than what actually took place at some events.

Orad Hi-Tec Systems provided the technology chosen by several international networks to enhance their broadcasts during the Games.

Among the techniques used at Sydney are virtual runners, which ran alongside the real Olympic athletes at the world-record pace. The virtual runners look like they are a part of the action, and allow viewers to see how close the runners are to a record.

Broadcasters also used the company's Virtual World Record line at several swimming and track-and-field events. For example, a computer-drawn line marked the spot a long jumper must cross to break a record.

Similar technology is used to show the line of scrimmage on some U.S. networks' National Football League telecasts.

Networks using Orad's tools in Sydney included: NBC, ARD of Germany, Japan's NHK, France2 and Australia's Channel 7.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

Recently, some of my friends' parents have given them more privileges. They are allowed to stay out later, go downtown by subway, and go out with one boy, rather than in groups. My parents are unable to let go and are uncomfortable with my doing these things. I'm afraid my friends won't like me anymore. What should I do?

Concerned

Dear Concerned,

If your friends are true friends, they will not like you because of the privileges you have. Instead, suggest activities that your parents approve of that you can do together.

As well, if you feel that your parents aren't treating you fairly, try and talk to them about it. If you arrange a time to sit down with them, they will be more likely to listen to you. Tell them what you want to do, and ask their reasons for why you aren't allowed to do certain things. Tell them why you think you should be able to have certain privileges and ask if you can do things to earn them. For example, offer to vacuum the house in exchange for staying out an hour later. Work out compromises that you can both agree on.

Even if your parents don't give in to you, don't get upset. You have lots of time to do all these things. I'm sure your parents aren't giving you all these restrictions to be mean. They do it because they worry. Just have patience with them, and eventually, they'll know when it's time to let go.

Karilani is actually three girls in high school. The drawing is a fiction. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Campaign Tops Half-Way Mark

UJA FEDERATION Campaign 2001 -- The Campaign For Our Children - has raised close to 60% of its $45 million goal. In just six weeks, the campaign has reached out to every corner of the community, with gifts from nearly 15,000 donors, bringing the total to $26 million.

The campaign objective is four million more than last year, with increased contributions designated for programs to help young people at risk and bring them closer to Jewish life. According to Campaign Co-Chairs Ed Sonshine and Ron Frisch, donor response has exceeded their expectations. The Campaign For Our Children has received over $2.5 million in new and increased gifts, with most donors increasing 10 - 25%.

"The need is so urgent and the cause so compelling that people from every age and stage of life are rallying like a family around the campaign," said Women's Campaign and Advocacy Chair Dodi Weill.

The Campaign pace will increase even more in two weeks when October telethons take place. Telethon Chairs Peter Ekstein, Debbie Kimel and Carole Sterling anticipate more than 300 volunteers will be Calling For Kids, October 29 to November 2. "The October telethon team is geared up to carry on the community-wide momentum created by September's Super Sunday/Super Week," said Kimel.

There's still time to participate in the telethons. For additional information, contact Clare Adam at 416-635-2883, ext. 184.

"This Israel Experience offers adults a fresh perspective, seeing Israel the way our young people do," explained Morris Albert, UJA FEDERATION Assistant Campaign Director. "The approach combines hands-on educational programming with team-building."

Organizers coordinated the timing so adult participants can interact with the Canadian birthright israel contingent. The Pathfinders Israel Experience will spend Shabbat in Jerusalem and join the birthright israel Gala Evening on Saturday night.

Emergency Relief Rises

Emergency relief requests to Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) -- a UJA FEDERATION beneficiary agency - have risen significantly. In the first half of 2000, the last period for which statistics are available, JF&CS responded to 100 financial assistance requests from people faced with housing or utilities emergencies. "Government assistance to those living at or below the poverty line is inadequate and still continues to face cuts," said JF&CS Executive Director Gordon Wolfe. "Affordable housing is becoming increasingly hard to find in the Greater Toronto Area."

The JF&CS emergency telephone record is a clear indicator, said Wolfe, that the problem of poverty is growing more acute. During the first half of the year, the agency saved 58 people from eviction by providing last month's rent; prevented hydro or telephone service from being cut off for 29 people; and provided short term hotel accommodation for 13 others.

Additional dollars raised by UJA FEDERATION Campaign 2001 -The Campaign For Our Children -- will provide low-income Jewish parents with additional rent relief so they can avoid eviction and raise their children in Jewish neighbourhoods. "Community support has never been more urgently needed," stressed Wolfe.

Debby Feldman, Social Work Supervisor, JF&CS.

"J'accuse...!"

Canada's UN vote unconscionable

Editorial

The government's support for UN Security Council (SC) Resolution 1322 was unconscionable. Fortified with that piece of paper, Yasser Arafat continued to issue his deadly instructions for more violence. As Ehud Barak issued orders to send Israel's children into shelters, Yasser Arafat issued orders to send Palestine's children into the streets just in front of armed PA police officers and armed fighters from the Tanzim, the PLO's para-military brigade. Predictably, scores of Arafat's own people have lost their lives. But then, this has been his intention all along.

In language loaded with code-words rife with jihad-oriented meaning for the Palestinians, the resolution essentially blamed Israel for the conflagration that has engulfed the tiny strip of land between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River.

When it was Canada's turn to vote on the resolution Oct. 7, the truth of the situation "on the ground" had been known to the world for several days. Palestinian violence had been pre-arranged well in advance of the visit by Ariel Sharon to the Temple Mount, scripted by the ghoulish hand that wilfully consigns children to "martyrdom." Indeed, the violence had already started in Gaza a week before Sharon's ill-advised stroll.

As Jews were preparing for Yom Kippur, the resolution passed and with its passage, the terrible train of events was set rolling that gave anti-Israel and anti-Jewish hatred its renewed, heightened momentum.

Vandals attack Jewish, Palestinian sites

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Six Ontario synagogues, a community centre and a Palestinian communal building were vandalized last week with graffiti, smashed windows and inflammatory leaflets.

Greater Toronto Area

Meanwhile, at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, a bomb scare on Yom Kippur prompted a call to police but the bomb threat proved to be a false alarm. In Ottawa, a bomb threat at the Israeli embassy also proved to be a hoax.

Most of the attacks on the six synagogues and Bathurst Jewish Community Centre took place around Yom Kippur, the holiest event on the Jewish calendar. Palestine House was vandalized a day before.

The worst damage occurred in Ottawa where rocks were thrown through the front, glass doors of the downtown Beth Shalom Synagogue in the early morning hours after Kol Nidre services. Rocks also smashed the windows of the synagogue's school and "Islamic Freedom" was spray-painted on the wall next to the front doors.

The damage was quickly repaired for morning services and the graffiti was covered with a plywood barrier, according to a source at the shul who wished to remain anonymous.

The repairs were done quickly because "we have a fairly elderly congregation and we didn't want to alarm them," the source said.

In London, the Beth Tefilah Synagogue was the first to be attacked when on Oct. 2 it was spray-painted with, "Hamas will not stay quiet," while in Toronto, a brick was thrown through a window at the B'nai Torah Synagogue and through a window at the Tiferet Israel Synagogue.

In other incidents, graffiti defaced the Pride of Israel Synagogue and eggs were thrown at the building; the Bathurst Jewish Centre was marred with graffiti stating, "Palestine Forever," and "F... You" was written twice on the building.

Meanwhile, at the Shaar Shalom Synagogue, cars in the parking lot were leafleted with flyers that equated the Star of David with the Nazi swastika and other leaflets accusing Israeli snipers of "indiscriminately" shooting "defenceless Palestinian children."

At Palestine House in Mississauga, a city immediately to the west of Toronto, graffiti proclaimed "The Jewish People Lives" and "Death to Arafat." In addition a Palestinian flag was torn down and "The People of Israel Lives" was written in Hebrew, according to Rashad Saleh, president of Palestine House.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada deplored the vandalism – as well as the use of inflammatory rhetoric in community protests.

"We strongly condemn the acts of vandalism against a Palestinian centre in Toronto as well as against Jewish synagogues and other institutions in Toronto and Ottawa," said Congress president Moshe Ronen.

Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region, called the synagogue vandalism "akin to an assault. The words do, in fact, hurt. It adds to the hatred that's out there. It should be decried on all sides."

"The recent attack at Palestine House and the defacing of synagogues is deplorable and counterproductive," said Lawrence Hart, national president of B'nai Brith Canada. "Attacks on religious and cultural institutions contribute nothing to trying to resolve the unfortunate situation in the Middle East."

pages 3-9, 37-40

Ronen said he had contacted Saleh and "expressed our outrage at the vandalism against Palestine House."

Ronen also raised Congress' concerns over the "kind of rhetoric and language used [by demonstrators] at the Israeli consulate here, in Montreal and [the embassy] in Ottawa. It has been highly offensive, highly inappropriate."

Demonstrators at the consulate in Toronto, led by Saleh, chanted slogans comparing Israeli Prime Minster Ehud Barak and Likud leader Ariel Sharon to Hitler. Some paraded with a banner equating the swastika to the Star of David.

Ronen said such inflammatory rhetoric "will lead to a deterioration of relations."

"I think the relationship was moving slowly in the right direction. A lot of harm has come as a result of events. If they keep the rhetoric up, there's no point in meeting" in the future, he added.

Saleh strongly condemned the attacks on Palestine House and on the Jewish buildings, but he refused to back away from the rhetoric he employed at the consulate demonstrations.

"Rhetoric is on both sides. You can't blame only the Palestinians for rhetoric," he said, although he did not offer examples of similar rhetoric from local Jewish leaders.

He defended his use of the Nazi analogy, saying "I see what Israelis are doing with my own eyes. What they are doing is the same, sometimes worse."

The vandalism incidents were reported to police who are investigating in co-operation with the Toronto hate crimes unit.

As of late last week, police had no specific leads, said Det.-Sgt. Rick Stubbings, who heads the hate crimes unit. Vandalism incidents "are difficult cases. If you look back on our published reports, one overriding factor is that hate crimes are often spontaneous attacks" and it is "difficult to culminate in arrests."

Anyone with information about the incidents is asked to call police at 416-808-3204 or call Crimestoppers at 416-222-8477.

Packed rally for Israel slams Canada's UN vote

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel was cheered and Canada jeered at last week's packed rally to support the Jewish state during the current upheaval in the Middle East.

An estimated crowd of over 3,000 – most indoors at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation in Thornhill, and hundreds standing outside – thundered its approval of Israel's right to defend itself against Palestinian attacks while trying to pursue an elusive peace, and booed loudly when Canada's vote at the United Nations condemning Israel was raised.

The Toronto rally was one of several across Canada last week. Similar gatherings took place in Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa and Montreal.

The hastily organized solidarity rally in Toronto took place prior to the dramatic escalation of events the following day, precipitated by the beating deaths in Ramallah of two Israeli soldiers. It was also held in the wake of several acts of vandalism against local synagogues and a Palestinian centre.

There was a heavy police presence at the BAYT synagogue and on adjacent streets. Organizers were braced for a counter-demonstration by Palestinians, but none materialized.

While speakers pledged their support for peace, they reserved their harshest words for Palestinian Authority chairman Yasser Arafat, and for Canada for its vote to condemn "excessive use of force" against Palestinians by Israeli troops.

Opposition leader Stockwell Day, who has been aggressively courting the Jewish vote, was praised for taking Ottawa to task over its decision to support the resolution.

Rabbi Baruch Taub, spiritual leader of the BAYT synagogue, said, to applause, that Jews are "angered by this gross distortion of reality." The resolution, adopted with a 14 to 0 vote by the UN's Security Council Oct. 7, "in essence condemns Canada and the UN."

"The Toronto Jewish community stands rock solid in support of Israel," he said to loud cheers and waving of banners and Israeli flags.

Referring to the UN vote, Keith Landy, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, asked, "Have they lost their minds?"

"Yes!" the audience responded in unison.

Landy called on Jews to reject the attempt to place responsibility on Israel for the violence, and reject too the resolution's reference to "the provocation" at the Temple Mount, which triggered the riots.

Crisis in Israel

Montrealers show their support

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For the second time in two days, Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler last week denounced his own government's position on the recent eruption of violence in Israel and the territories.

Montrealers turned out en masse last week to show their support at the community gathering on behalf of Israel.

Coast to Coast

The first time was at FEDERATION CJA's annual meeting. The second occasion was at a community solidarity rally held at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue last Wednesday. The rally drew more than 2,500 people, according to the rally organizers, including a large number of students outside the synagogue.

Referring to the UN Security Council resolution that referred to Israel's "excessive" use of force, Cotler indicated he was willing to pay the political price, if any, for veering away from government solidarity.

"As long as you know that there is a moral compass in front of you, then you know you can stand up and be counted. And don't worry about the political consequences."

In his remarks, which were punctuated by bursts of sustained applause, Cotler reiterated the comments he had expressed at the previous meeting, saying the resolution was "one-sided, misinformed and prejudicial to peace in the Middle East."

It was one-sided, he said, because it made no reference to Palestinian violence, to the fact that Israelis have also died, to the Palestinian desecration of Joseph's Tomb, to any obligation on the part of the Palestinian Authority to seek to quell the violence, and because it included only the Arabic name for Jerusalem's Temple Mount.

"In a region where words are holy writ, this omission does not appear to be accidental," he said.

The core of the conflict, he said, remains the refusal of the Palestinians to recognize the "legitimacy," as opposed to the mere "existence," of a Jewish state.

He exhorted the audience to each "sensitize" 10 non-Jews about the current Middle East situation. If audience members don't know any non-Jews, he suggested, that may be part of the problem.

"We talk too often to ourselves," he said, "and wonder why they [non-Jews] don't understand. Go and study and prepare the case."

The remarks of the synagogue's Rabbi Reuben Poupko were also greeted with loud bursts of applause from the crowd, a few of whom brandished Israeli flags or signs that read "Am Yisrael Chai!"

"We have nothing to be ashamed of, nothing to apologize for!" the rabbi said to a thunderous response.

"We give and we give and we give, and it's only met with violence and rejection," he said.

The rabbi singled out a Montreal university student, Ella Barr, who was walking downtown and came across a Palestinian rally in which an Israeli flag was being torched. Barr lunged toward the flag to grab and save it.

Barr approached the podium, and the crowd cheered her.

"I pledge to you that students will never be alone again" in their efforts to present Israel's case, Rabbi Poupko said. "It's the students who are in the front line."

The speakers at the rally used different words to express similar ideas, among them that Jews would remain united in solidarity with Israel and that Palestinians have cynically used children and put them tragically in harm's way.

"Instead of sending kids [into riots], why not send them back to school?" asked Israeli Consul General Shlomo Avital.

Yasser Arafat, he charged, "wants all of East Jerusalem and the Temple Mount, and it's only the beginning. He wants to 'liberate' all of Palestine.

"We have news for him, it's been liberated since 1948," he said to cheers.

Robert Libman, mayor of Cote St. Luc and director of B'nai Brith Canada, Quebec region, said people have been "sickened" by media reports on CBC and CNN.

B'nai Brith, he said, has fielded phone call after phone call reporting anti-Semitic and anti-Israel incidents over the last two weeks.

The calls have included reports of younger Jews being "harassed and assaulted by members of the Palestinian community" and of threats to synagogues.

At the Palestinian rallies held Yom Kippur weekend, Libman said, shouts of "Die Jews" were heard.

"It exceeds the worst we've ever heard," Libman said. "Not one speaker tonight will say anything disparaging against the Palestinian people."

Dorothy Zalcman Howard, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), urged members of the audience to "seize the opportunity to speak out," to use every means possible to "influence public policy" and to counteract the "despicable propaganda that's flooded our senses."

The event was sponsored by B'nai Brith's Quebec region, the Canada Israel Committee's Quebec region, CIJR, CJC-Q, CZF-Quebec, CSQ, FEDERATION CJA, the Montreal Board of Rabbis and the Rabbinic Council of Montreal.

We are one and will stay one: Israeli ambassador

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — In a strong display of solidarity, over 1,000 people crowded into Congregation Agudath Israel recently for a community-wide rally in support of Israel.

Leaders of the local Jewish community, clergy, politicians and representatives of national Jewish organizations, spoke to the crowd about events taking place in Israel and around the world.

Coast to Coast

In introducing recently appointed Ambassador of Israel to Canada, Haim Divon, Stephen Greenberg, president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir, said, "I regret that your first opportunity to speak to our community comes at a time of crisis."

Divon expressed his appreciation to the local Jewish community for its strong support, and said he would be conveying the message to his government.

"The situation in Israel is tragic, but we are determined to continue and work for peaceful co-existence.

"At the same time, we must protect ourselves and make sure that Israel is strong enough to stand against any enemy. The international community has let us down, but when I see you here in front of me, that is what gives us the strength and the inspiration.

"We are one and we will stay one, and I would like to thank you on behalf of all Israelis who are facing very rough times."

Speaking on behalf of the government of Canada, Marlene Catterall, MP for Ottawa West-Nepean, said that "Canada stands ready to assist in achieving a lasting peace."

Rob Ritter, executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee, told the crowd that "we are in the midst of a dark episode in Jewish history; over the last week, the fig leaf has been removed here in Canada as well. Acts of violence and hatred across Canada must be stopped."

Ritter urged community members to make their views known by calling, writing and sending e-mails to their local MPs, and to the prime minister. "We must not allow Canada to be only a fair-weather friend," said Ritter.

The Shira Ottawa choir, under the direction of Cantor Daniel Benlolo, led the audience in singing songs of peace, followed by the singing of Hatikvah.

Vancouver gathering draws 1,200

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Today is real and touching proof that the bond between the Jews of Vancouver and the Jews of Israel is strong and steadfast, said Meir Romem to a standing room only gathering at Schara Tzedeck synagogue last Thursday evening.

"In all of my 35 years as a civil servant I have never been so overwhelmed as I have been by the rallies in support of Israel held yesterday in Toronto and now here in Vancouver today," said Romem, Israel consul general to Toronto and Western Canada.

Almost 1,200 people attended the rally where Romem and Greater Vancouver's Jewish Federation president Bob Willmot urged members of the crowd to contact their friends and family in Israel.

Willmot also stressed the need for Vancouver Jews to come together during this time of crisis. "We are together now because that's what families do when times are tough. And times are not very good right now in our Jewish family. There's a lot of pain and a lot of anger and we need to come together for ourselves and for our families in Israel. We can only get through this by being together with people who understand – without questions, without defence and without history lessons," he said.

Judy Mandleman, national vice-chair of the Canada Israel Committee, chaired the event. She echoed the same sentiments of solidarity, stressing that Israel needs to know that Jews around the world are there for them.

"That's really the purpose of our community solidarity meeting," Mandleman said. "They need to know that they have their own allies in the Diaspora."

Mandleman also said that Jews in Canada must continue to be in touch with their government representatives. "We have to encourage people to write the members of Parliament and the prime minister, and tell them that we strongly object to the fact that the Canadian government cast its vote condemning Israel.

"This was an unacceptable resolution, and the fact that Canada voted with and allied themselves with Russia and China and Malaysia – countries that certainly are violators of human rights in their own countries – is really unacceptable. A vote like this works right into the hands of [Yasser] Arafat and fuels his belief and feelings that violence is getting him what he wants," Mandleman said.

Despite this week's horrific murders, brutalities and violence in Israel, Jews – both in Israel and the Diaspora – are still ready to work for peace, Romem said.

"There is no alternative, neither for us nor for the Palestinians, but to make peace. And we are ready today," Romem said. "Arafat should know that Israel is there forever."

Crisis in Israel

Student reactions subdued to Mideast violence

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The recent spate of violence in Israel is resonating at some Canadian university campuses, but as of last week reactions appeared to be relatively subdued, according to Jewish campus professionals who spoke to The CJN.

"There is no conflict at the moment," said Arye Berk, director of the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Western Ontario. He noted, however, that the university's Arab Students' Association had distributed a petition the previous week.

The document, addressed to the United Nations and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, condemned the "Israeli government's heinous crimes" and urged pressure on Israel to stop "blatant assaults on human rights."

It was accompanied by a one-page typed sheet noting the "massacre of Palestinian civilians" and referring to Likud leader, MK Ariel Sharon, whose controversial visit to the Temple Mount preceded the violence, as "a demonstrated corrupt and twisted individual."

Zac Kaye

Last Tuesday, a small group of Arab students gathered at Concrete Beach, the area in front of the university community centre, to read the names of Palestinians who had been killed in the clashes in Israel, said Berk.

On Thursday, the JSU held two lunchtime peace rallies, to accommodate students who had classes during the first one. The sessions, held at Concrete Beach, focused mainly on prayers and were attended by about 70 and 40 students, respectively, according to Berk.

Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto was planning separate rallies to show solidarity with Israel, at the York University and University of Toronto campuses. Late last week, plans were not yet finalized, but the events were likely to be held this week, pending consultation with students, said Zac Kaye, JCS executive director.

On Campus

At Wilfrid Laurier University, in Waterloo, Ont., a November dialogue involving Christian, Muslim and Jewish students was in the works, said Roseanne Brown, director of regional campus organizations. "It's quite peaceful," she added.

At the nearby University of Waterloo – where Brown said there has been "a history" of negative propaganda – Muslim students held a prayer session, and student newspaper Imprint ran an article quoting a Muslim student and a Jewish student on the situation in Israel.

In response to Rayan Yahfoufi's assertion that the conflict is about oppression, Jewish student Mark Eltis was quoted as saying, "Some things that have been not so mentioned in the media is that Palestinian police are opening fire on Isreali [sic] soldiers, and that is a clear violation of the Oslo accord. I don't think anyone visiting the holy sites is a cause for violence."

Arye Berk

Compared to their more easterly counterparts, Vancouver campuses are generally quiet, but not necessarily apolitical, said Gabe Meranda, executive director of the Vancouver B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation.

Last week he and a Hillel student "very calmly debated" socialist/communist students who had posted a sign calling for an end to Israel's "massacre" of Palestinians.

"Neither of us were budging on the use of the word 'massacre,'" Meranda reported. "That was the only thing, so far, on campus."

Although he didn't anticipate any backlash, "we are vigilant," Meranda said.

Imagine if the Torah said nothing about moral behavior. Would you suddenly become a liar, a thief, an opportunist?

Then why, with Torah and halacha's explicit demands for moral excellence, do so many flounder in this crucial area?

To be observant, you cannot disregard interpersonal mitzvot.

If you meticulously cover your challot on Friday night but are inconsistent about your sensitivity to your family and friends, are you really a Torah observant Jew?

Yet in violation of Torah, too many in our community, while continuing to achieve unprecedented heights in Torah study and observance of many mitzvot, fail in their personal relationships.

The problem is not that Orthodox Jews are any less ethical than the non-Orthodox. In fact, many individual and group assistance projects within the Orthodox community are the pride of the entire Jewish community. What's crucial is that Torah sets a high standard for all of us to follow and that we cannot deny any shortcomings within our community. In ceremony. In ritual. And in ethics.

It is painful to hear about committed Jews who say and do the wrong things, cheat or get involved in shameful scandals. These Jews ignore not only the spirit of the Torah we hold so dear, but the halachot that should be our guide. A guide not just to our communities and our organizations but to individual family members, business people and citizens as well.

The Torah demands a balance. It does not allow our achievements in the arena of ceremonial and ritual mitzvot to cover up failures in the arena of interpersonal mitzvot.

The Orthodox Caucus.
A catalyst for self-improvement.

Through our S. Daniel Abraham and Ira L. Rennert Torah Ethics Project, we have activated a program designed for self-improvement.

Working as a catalyst with the major institutions of our communities, its synagogues and day schools, its media and its homes, we are creating programs and materials that encourage the study of a number of key halachic ethical issues, neighborhood by neighborhood, family by family, one theme at a time.

Will this work?

Our single-minded approach has already been tested in many communities. To the members of these communities, in yeshivot, from synagogue pulpits and at thousands of Shabbat tables, ethical behavior has taken on a new urgency. As adherents of halacha and responsible members of society.

Now leading local rabbis, educators and lay leaders are proud to participate in the second annual Torah Ethics Project, starting in the coming weeks with Kiddush and Chillul Hashem and continuing with other ethical themes.

If we are not the "Light unto the nations" we are meant to be, it is not because of imperfections in halacha. It is because of imperfections in ourselves.

Relationships between Jew and Jew, Jew and non-Jew, and the dignity we must afford men and women alike, are all covered in detail in our rich halachic, aggadic and mussar literature, as well as in the biographies of the leading personalities of every generation.

Derech Eretz, Anivut, Gemilut Chasadim, and Arevut must be taught and lived as equals to Hilchot Shabbat, Talmud Torah, Eruv and Nidah. Torah, after all, was given to us in its entirety at Sinai. We dare not pick and choose our halachic commitments.

A day will come when turning your back on a shady business deal, working through a problem with your spouse and accurately reporting your income to the tax authorities will become indispensible to the definition of "observant".

On that day, our goal will have been achieved.

Crisis in Israel

Students respond to Palestinians' depiction of Israel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In the wake of the most recent violence in Israel and the territories, local Jewish students are struggling to counteract a new propaganda campaign being waged by their Palestinian counterparts on Montreal campuses.

The war is not a new one. Simon Ben Simon, director of the Hillel Jewish Student Centre, says only half-facetiously that it dates back to Israel's creation in 1948.

On Campus

In fact, the propaganda wars on campus date back in earnest to Israel's incursion into Lebanon in 1982 and to the intifadah that began in 1987.

The trouble with trying to provide some sort of Jewish counterbalance to the Palestinian students seems to stem, at least in part, from the fact that campuses have historically been places where Israel has been cast as the subjugator and the Palestinians as the subjugated.

It is generally agreed that in most instances, Jewish students have not been as well-organized as Palestinian students. One reason is lack of financial resources. But another factor in students' continuing sense of frustration has been the inability to influence the way Israel is portrayed in campus newspapers and during so-called Palestine "cultural" weeks.

The display tables at such events are filled with highly charged political material excoriating Israel. Efforts to confront Palestinian students about the material have inevitably degenerated into shouting matches, and campus administrations have not addressed the fact that these are not "cultural" events at all. When Palestinian students bring in a speaker, it is almost always on a Friday night, when Jewish students cannot attend.

At McGill and Concordia universities and at the Université du Québec à Montréal, a pro-Palestinian student group called Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) quickly capitalized on the recent events in the Middle East by organizing a demonstration and march from the Concordia's downtown Hall Building to the Israeli consulate. An Israeli flag was burned there on the street.

Flyers advertising the march asked people to "end the massacre of Palestinians," and the rhetoric included accusing Israel of "ethnic cleansing."

The march drew upwards of 300 vociferous participants but received only scant media attention, in part because it took place during the same week as the death of former Canadian prime minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Yom Kippur rallies

On Oct. 7 and Oct. 9, over the Yom Kippur weekend, Palestinian supporters staged two more rallies, drawing thousands onto Montreal streets. About 300 Jewish students, in a move initiated by Rabbi Reuben Poupko, held their own rally on the night following the first demonstration, which took place on Shabbat.

The SPHR also has a slick Web site – www.sphr.org – which allows for the quick transmission of information and enables supporters to galvanize into action quickly.

According to Ben Simon, Palestinian students have become, "a bit more organized now than in the last few years."

Still, Hillel representatives from various campuses recently met twice in one week at Hillel headquarters on Stanley Street to try to devise a strategy to counteract the SPHR's latest initiatives.

According to Andrew Elbaz, former president of Hillel's city-wide executive, the students decided to launch an all-out PR blitz on all campuses where Hillel operates. They plan to place ads in campus newspapers and radio stations and distribute pamphlets, in order to present the Israel government's position on the latest hostilities.

One of the flyers will include the now-notorious New York Times front-page photograph that purported to depict a Palestinian youth lying on the Temple Mount with an Israeli soldier standing over him. In fact, the image was of a Jewish youth from Chicago being helped by an Israeli soldier at a Jerusalem gas station after he had been assaulted by Palestinians.

Elbaz said there is a need "to respond to the unbelievable and disgusting demonstration" that the SPHR students organized at Concordia.

The strategy is two-fold, Elbaz said: to arm Jewish students with information they can use to counter denunciation of Israel, and to "educate the larger campus community."

The goal "is not to convince the Palestinians," he said. "But we have to give [the general student body] another perspective.

"It's frustrating. Who else on campus will educate on Israel if we don't?"

"Jewish students want to feel they're doing something," Ben Simon said.

But he seemed to concede that Jewish students' desire to get an equal hearing on campuses is almost destined to fall short, or even fail, given the disproportionate level of support Palestinians have always received on campuses. In a way, he suggested, campus publicity is a microcosm of the way the general media deal with Israel's image.

Still, Jewish students are determined to respond.

"You have to act when Israelis are being portrayed as butchers," Ben Simon said.

Throughout the wider Muslim world, the frenzied masses took to the streets with the blood-lusting shouts of "death to Israel; death to the Jews." The leader of Hezbollah in Lebanon exhorted Palestinians to kill Israelis wherever and whenever they could. The mullahs in Jerusalem urged their people to throw the Jews out of the land. As far away as Indonesia, militant Muslims were reported scouring the streets of Jakarta looking for Israelis to kill. Alas, even on Canadian streets last week, in Toronto and Montreal, one heard the frightening, sickening shrieks of "death to the Jews."

Let no one believe that the obscene UN vote was meaningless.

Once again, it pointed to Israel as the "guilty" party in the dispute; once again, it pointed to Israel as an aggressor; once again, it confirmed in the hate-filled minds of Israel's enemies the twisted image of the Jewish state as an alien, foreign body in the Muslim Middle East that must be cast out from the region, justifying any and all measures, however vile, toward that end.

Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy's dismissive attitude toward his support of the resolution was thus offensive. Moreover, he is deluding himself and the Canadian people if he discounts the connection between the upward-spiralling level of violent behaviour in the Middle East, even the upward-spiralling level of violent rhetoric in Canada and elsewhere in the western world, and the passage of Security Council Resolution 1322.

J'espère

But Canada is a better country than the kingdoms, dictatorships and military juntas that fiendishly wave the resolution as a flag fanning the fires of intolerance and hate. And Canadians are a better people than the despots, demagogues and military rulers for whom SC Resolution 1322 is, in truth, but one more of their many instruments of oppression against their own citizens.

Israel, a country of six million people, whose entire north-south length stretches with considerable room to spare between Montreal and Toronto, is the only democracy in the vast region of the Middle East. The constitutional and governmental values that sustain Israel are the very ones that give mettle and substance to Canada as well.

Israel is the only homeland anywhere on earth for the Jewish people. In a real sense therefore, the "battle for Jerusalem," as Arafat has proudly referred to the violence he unleashed last month, is a battle for Israel's very existence, for its legitimacy as a sovereign Jewish nation in the Moslem Middle East.

Precisely because of Canada's inherent goodness, we hope and expect Ottawa will yet take steps to publicly abate the sting of SC Resolution 1322. The very least Canada must do is to publicly denounce those leaders who exhort their people to violence against Israel and against Jews, and who are still committed to Israel's destruction.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Criticism of Sharon misplaced

I take issue with Avi Markus's letter to The CJN (Oct. 12) condemning Ariel Sharon for the current violence. Just as every human being does, Sharon has a right to visit the Temple Mount – a place open to the public. Further, the visit was cleared in advance by Jibril Rajoub, the Palestinian Authority's head of security, who said that there would be no problem as long as Sharon did not enter the Al-Aksa mosque or the Dome of the Rock.

This incident has been used by the pro-Arab media as a scapegoat for an escalation in violence that had actually started to some extent even prior to Sharon's visit. It's sad to see that a member of our community has fallen prey to this sort of nonsense, and would actually deny access to Judaism's most holy site to anyone, let alone a Jewish member of the Knesset.

Remember how Canada voted (I)

On Oct. 7, Canada endorsed the vicious, counterfactual and counter-productive anti-Israel resolution of the UN Security Council. This is surely an act that should be remembered in respect to the looming Canadian election.

Remember how Canada voted (II)

For Canada to vote for the resolution condemning Israel is a travesty. In political terms it is downright foolish.

Hard to trust Day's platform

For those enamoured with Alliance leader Stockwell Day's commitment to fund private day schools (or provide tax rebates), his recent flip-flop on his flat tax proposal should be a warning sign.

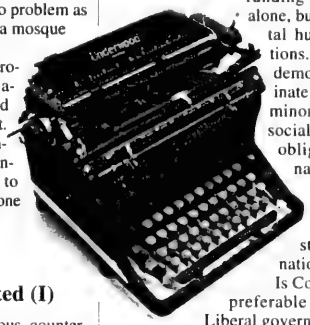
Democracy respects human rights

Judy Cohen's letter ("One Issue Myopia," CJN, Oct. 5) invokes the memory of the Holocaust and urges us not to support Stockwell Day's Alliance party just because Day has promised to provide tax credits for non-funded denominational schools. According to Cohen, the Alliance's social policies threaten "liberal-social democracy," and we should not be swayed by the school funding issue.



The flaw with this argument is that the school funding issue does not stand alone, but is based on fundamental human rights considerations. A healthy liberal-social democracy does not discriminate openly against religious minorities. A healthy liberal-social democracy respects its obligations under the international human rights treaties that were developed in the wake of the Holocaust to ensure that state-sponsored discrimination would be eliminated. Is Cohen suggesting that it is preferable to support a federal Liberal government that has refused to take steps within its power to remedy actual state-sponsored religious discrimination against Jews and other religious minorities in Ontario education funding? I am surprised that a person invoking the memory of the Holocaust can be so cavalier about the importance of human rights.

Tevye was right

I found your article about the "STAR" program (CJN, Sept. 28), very interesting. One-hundred and fifty rabbis, synagogue executives and lay leaders listened to two major Jewish philanthropists say that they were ready to give away $18 million (US) to North American synagogues.

And, by the way, remarked one of them, the Reform and Conservative movements are "accidents of history." Also, added the other one, this tradition of lighting Havdalah candles after Shabbat is too inconvenient; Sunday night makes much more sense.

What is interesting is that no one seemed to protest. Perhaps Tevye was right: "When you're rich, they think you really know!"

Perspectives

IN SUPPORT OF ISRAEL

'We have nothing to be ashamed of'

Friends... 12-year old Mohammed al-Dura tragically lost his life in a crossfire in a street battle... There is not a single decent human being who was not pained by that sight... We ask that you remember who put him there... Everyone acknowledges that the stones came first, that the Molotov cocktails came first, that the shooting from the guns of the Palestinian policemen who, until two weeks ago, were serving in joint patrols with Israeli policemen, came first.

It was only after those stones were thrown, and after those Molotov cocktails were thrown, and the guns were fired, that in self-defence and in a desire to quell violence, the State of Israel responded in a way that would make any Western country proud, in a way that meets the norms, standards and laws of any civilized country.

We have nothing to be ashamed of, we have nothing to apologize for. Those who need to be embarrassed and ashamed know who they are.

The French camera crews who take pictures only of the last frames of the event and not the beginning know who they are. Those who have ignored the violations of Oslo for seven years know who they are.

And those who buy into the sick distortion that the visit by a member of Knesset to our Temple Mount is somehow a provocation know who they are... those who spread the lie in the face of casualties even before the visit by Ariel Sharon, in the face of calls from Al Aksa Mosque that it was the time to eradicate all the Jews in Palestine, in the face of the Palestinian media calling for people to go out into the street, in the face of Palestinian school principal emptying their schools and sending children into the streets, and in the face of Yasser Arafat's Tanzim offering $300 to every Palestinian who produces an injured child and $2,000 to every Palestinian who produces a dead child. They all know who they are...

It is now time to turn to our beloved country Canada. I have in my hands United Nations Security Council Resolution 1322. I will not defile this holy place by reading this filth here in this synagogue. This resolution, which purports to condemn Israel, condemns no one but the UN itself and condemns all the 14 who supported it, Canada included – one-sided is putting it mildly.

The UN Security Council has allowed itself to become a co-conspirator in anti-Israel propaganda, has allowed itself to become a co-conspirator with the Palestinian Authority, has allowed itself to become a co-conspirator with all the ignorant analysts who determine the sources and causes of outbreaks of violence in Israel. This piece of paper is worthless, this piece of paper is garbage.

We must not forget 12-year-old Mohammed al-Dura, but let us also not forget the three soldiers kidnapped by the Hezbollah: Swa'id Omar, Avraham Benjamin and Adi Avitan. Or the Jew who was killed trying to rescue Joseph's Tomb. Remember his name: Hillel Lieberman. Hillel Lieberman ran to save those sifrei Torah in Joseph's Tomb, Hillel Lieberman ran to the grave of Joseph to save those holy books. His bullet-ridden body was found days later...

As Shimon Peres put it: "If they cannot be trusted with Joseph's Tomb, if they cannot be trusted with our holy places, then what can they be trusted with?"

I want also to speak to you about somebody else, the most important person here tonight.

It is an extraordinary story. Last week, there was a Palestinian demonstration downtown. An Israeli flag was set aflame in the streets of downtown Montreal. Passing by was a young Jewish girl, too shy almost to come here tonight, but courageous enough to grab that burning flag and save it from the hands of the demonstrating Palestinians.

I want you to join me in honouring Ella Barr...

Students are on the front lines. We live in secure neighbourhoods. We don't need to confront the viciousness, except through television and in the newspapers. Students face it every day on campus. It's in their face, and too often they feel abandoned by our community and the leaders of our community... In the name of everyone here and in the name of the community leadership which has gathered here in an unprecedented show of unity, I pledge to the students that they will never again be alone. The resources of the community will be behind them.

And in the name of the students, I remind you of one simple truth: It is they who led us during the Soviet Jewry movement; it is they who led us so many crucial times during our history; it is they to whom honour goes and it is through Ella that we honour all of them...

As we were a crushed and humiliated people after the Holocaust, it was only the creation of this State that restored our pride and dignity and allowed us to go on... Our gratitude is boundless. We pledge today a solemn oath that we will always be there for the State and that we will walk proud and courageous in defence of the State of Israel.

And as every speaker has already said: Am Yisrael Chai.

'We will bear any burden'

In a few days the tiny sukkah will make its appearance on the landscape here and in Israel. The two structural forms of the sukkah – the walls must be sturdy, solid and secure and the roof must be open to the heavens – represent a dialectic of the condition of our people and our land.

Our borders must be sturdy, solid and secure so that we may dwell in peace inside our sukkat shalom – our sukkah of peace, while at the same time we are mindful of the ultimate need for Divine spiritual protection from the God of Israel above and from His Torah.

The mitzvah of the sukkah is unique. Unlike other mitzvot, theoretically all Jews could fulfil the mitzvah in one sukkah. If one could be so constructed, all we would need would be one sukkah. There is no requirement to build a separate sukkah for each person or family. I can live in your sukkah and you can live in mine.

We have gathered here tonight in what is nothing less than an oasis of truth. For close to two weeks, we have been vilified and castigated in ways that defy reason. We have come here tonight to reassert the truth, the truth of the events of the last weeks and the truth of the justice of our cause, the truth that it is necessary to defend the honour of the Jewish state and of the Jewish people.

We have come here to assert proudly and without hesitation that as a people we are unified in absolute solidarity with the people of the State of Israel.

For too long we have focused on what divides us as a community. Tonight we come together to affirm our singularity.

Tonight we leave all the labels at the door. We are simply – Jews.

Tonight... we are proud to defend the State of Israel and there is nothing for which we need apologize.

To paraphrase John F. Kennedy, "We will bear any burden, endure any hardship to defend the State of Israel."

For the world, the enduring image of the last week will be the tragic picture of Mohammed al-Dura, who died after being placed in the line of fire.

Golda Meir said it best: "We don't expect our adversary to have mercy on our children; all we ask is for them to have mercy on their own children"...

After Camp David, it became clear that it was Yasser Arafat who was to blame for the halt in the peace talks. Sympathy began to shift to Israel. Arafat employed a time-tested formula to recapture world sympathy and attention. He has wilfully produced a new list of teenage martyrs...

It is astonishing that after breathtaking concessions by Ehud Barak, after withdrawals from Lebanon, soldiers are captured on borders. After an offer to divide Jerusalem, there are riots in Jerusalem. What more need be done by Israel to secure peace? What more need be rejected by Arafat for the world community to recognize the true intentions of the other side?

The violence of the last week was made possible by the continuing incitement of the Palestinians... a call to arms from Palestinian mosques and Palestinian grade school textbooks, where the spirit of Oslo has yet to take hold...

I would suggest that for those who seek truth, the enduring image of the last two weeks is the picture in the New York Times of a young man bloodied in front of an Israeli soldier, with a caption identifying him as a Palestinian victim of Israeli military excesses. As it turns out, the name of this "Arab" is Tuvia Grossman.

Let me tell you the story of Tuvia Grossman: He was on his way to the Kotel for Rosh Hashanah services when his Arab cab driver pulled over and a gang of Palestinians quickly descended upon the taxi tearing four yeshiva students out of the cab and continued to beat them. Three escaped. Tuvia was left to suffer stab wounds and his head being beaten with a rock. Tuvia thought he was going to die. He did what any of us would have done at that moment. He recited the Shema...

Tuvia yelled the last word of the Shema. His assailants taken back by the anguished cry momentarily released their hold and he was indeed able to escape...

The defence of the cause for the State of Israel begins with its friends knowing the truth.

We have only one land. They have 21 lands. There is no ethnic difference in all 21 lands. They have essentially the same language, culture and faith.

We have one land, one language, one culture.

All we ask is one little land, one little sukkah, one little peaceful sukkah that has miraculously housed our people and will continue to be a homeland for our people.

I urge you. I beg you. Be not silent. The State of Israel needs you... Please let the citizens of Israel know they are not alone.

In essence we speak about one idea, one word – loyalty, loyalty to our God, loyalty to our Torah, loyalty to our people, loyalty to Israel, loyalty to our history, loyalty to our destiny and to our future.

Let us ensure that we continue to be worthy of the grandest of all titles: members of the Jewish people.

Am Yisrael Chai.

Opinions

One story: two views

Readers of this column may be aware that Christian tradition occasionally differs significantly from the way we Jews read Torah. This often has to do with our different theologies. Thus, in the story of creation, the Torah speaks of a ruach of God sweeping over the waters, which we understand either as a wind or a spirit but which Christian tradition takes as the first mention of the Holy Spirit, part of a triune God.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The other day, I came across another example which I find telling. It has to do with the story of Noah, the man who, with his family, was chosen by God to survive the Flood. Humanity had become so deeply addicted to violence and evildoing that God saw no possibility of redeeming it and decided to start anew with the family of Noah. He informed Noah of the impending destruction and asked him to build an ark, so that he and his family might be saved. Noah did as he was instructed and survived with his dear ones.

According to Christian scripture, in Letter to the Hebrews, Noah is characterized as a man of faith: "By faith Noah, warned by God about the events as yet unseen, respected the warning and built an ark to save his household."

Jewish tradition has a somewhat different view. While Noah was a righteous person who deserved to be saved, he was nonetheless considered deficient when compared to Abraham.

When Abraham was informed by God that He would destroy the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, Abraham began to argue with the Almighty and pointed out that there might be innocent people in the city who would be destroyed with the evildoers. He obtained Divine assurance that if there were but 10 innocent people in the city, God would not proceed. It turns out the 10 could not be found, but Abraham's compassion for people he did not know was an example of true piety as far as Jewish tradition was concerned.

In contrast, when Noah was instructed to proceed with the building of the ark because all living beings would be destroyed, he never expressed a single word of compassion. It was a fault that Jewish tradition could not overlook, despite all his other qualities. For that reason, it says, Noah was not destined to be the founder of a religion,while Abraham was rewarded by becoming the ancestor of the covenantal people.

This small example shows how, in subtle ways, two traditions can look at the same story and arrive at different conclusions. The nuances may be small, but in the aggregate they are significant.

Combating the great lie

Since 1973, Arab strategy in the war against Israel has been increasingly based on propaganda and the manipulation of public opinion.

The use of terror to trigger Israeli responses and the images of the intifadah are being carefully manipulated to create sympathy for the Arab "victims" and hostility towards Israeli "occupying forces." Now, this strategy has reached a new and perhaps ultimate stage.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Using the excuse of Ariel Sharon's "provocative" visit to the Temple Mount, Palestinian militias and police launched attacks on isolated military positions and civilian settlements. And as the Israeli police and military seek to fulfil their mission, they are being portrayed around the world as the aggressors.

The Palestinians prepared this public relations campaign carefully, using experienced propagandists who gave the media (particularly television) the same simple messages. In every appearance on CNN, the BBC, and other stages, they work in terms such as "occupied Palestine," violation of international law, and Muslim holy sites in Jerusalem.

As far as the media and most foreign diplomats are concerned, Middle Eastern history began in June 1967, with the Israeli conquest of "Arab" east Jerusalem.

Reporters and policy-makers are also gloriously ignorant of the incitement in the Palestinian media, in textbooks, and in the sermons of religious leaders. The Palestinian use of ambulances to carry ammunition and weapons (documented by Israel) is not a news story, but if an Israeli unit blew up these resupply convoys, condemnation would immediately follow.

As scenes of Palestinian attacks play in the background, CNN reporters respectfully ask a Palestinian whether he would agree that the Israelis are using excessive force. The criterion for morality has become an even body count, regardless of the source of the attacks. In this warped logic, since the Israeli military force is more powerful, it must be the aggressor.

At the same time, the victims of the violence are, by definition, all Arab, to the extent that many newspapers in the United States and Canada published an Associated Press photo of a bleeding "Palestinian" victim of Israeli brutality. This victim was in reality a young Jew from the United States, attacked by Palestinians.

The tragic image of a young Palestinian boy, caught in the crossfire, brought universal condemnation of Israel. Few bothered to look at the aerial photos showing that the Israelis, who were in a small concrete pillbox, had no way of seeing the boy amidst the Palestinians firing from all directions.

Most newspapers would require a special edition to correct the basic errors of the past week.

However, for years, the Israeli government refused to admit that it was in a propaganda war. With the goal of becoming Sweden or Norway, Yossi Beilin and Shimon Peres thought that providing information was too Zionistic and cancelled trips for foreign dignitaries to visit the Golan, Jerusalem, and Yad Veshem. Foreign journalists have been able to legitimize their Israel-bashing by finding self-denigrating Israelis to help.

The only effective responses to the propaganda attacks have come from private individuals and independent groups, both in Israel and in the Diaspora. These groups, such as the Canada-Israel Committee, have fought the battle, often overwhelmed by the number of false reports to correct.

During this crisis, we need to greatly expand this voluntary activity. With e-mail and Internet, the professional Israel bashers no longer have a monopoly on information – but correct information needs to be circulated widely and repeatedly. For every error and bias in the media, hundreds of protests need to be sent to get a response. When publicly funded centres of media, such as the CBC, are sources for propaganda, taxpayers must demand an end to its funding.

In Israel's early days, Jews from all over the world were fully involved in making sure that the state would survive. Now, the first priority should be fighting the propaganda war. In this war, there are no limits on age, gender, religious practice (if any), or political party. All that is necessary is an understanding of the basic facts and the determination to ensure that the truth be told.

Even with a major crisis brewing with the Arabs, nothing beats Jerusalem on Yom Kippur for urban tranquility – until the dogs wake up.

Earlier this month, despite Palestinian violence raging not so far away, the city came to a virtual standstill for 25 hours in observance of the solemn holiday. Cars were idle, offices closed, restaurants, cafés and cinemas were dark, and even local residents became unusually soft-spoken as Jerusalem took on a blissful serenity. The near-perfect peacefulness was broken only by the occasional ambulance and not infrequent noises from the city's growing canine population.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Let's make things perfectly clear straight from the top. Even at the risk of incurring the wrath of dog lovers worldwide, I hereby declare that I've had it with the dogs in Jerusalem – and their masters.

In my neighbourhood, the dogs seem to be taking over. Many roam the streets freely, often terrorizing children, letter carriers and bicycle riders and defecating all over the place.

I've yet to figure out why most owners never cease to be fascinated by watching their dogs relieve themselves – and then, of course, leaving the scene nonchalantly as if their pet had nothing to do with the whole operation. After all, what are the city's sanitation workers paid for anyway?

Adding to my mounting distaste for most dogs is their constant barking. In the complex of seven town houses where we live, there are no less than four dogs, most of whom can't seem to keep quiet for more than 10 minutes at a stretch.

The worst offender, a huge mutt known as Hetz (or Arrow) to his owners, does not bark but roars at the slightest trace of anybody or anything he doesn't know or like. Given the close proximity of buildings, this means lots of noise at all our hours of the day and night.

I recently asked the neighbour if there was not something he could do to reign in Hetz to minimize the disturbance to others. I knew my request might be futile, but I didn't figure it would trigger such a hostile response. I might as well have asked him to put Hetz out to pasture.

Dog owners obviously don't take kindly to others suggesting their four-legged creatures are anything but lovable and well behaved. And how dare I have the temerity to suggest that Hetz was more of a nuisance than my seven-year-old son playing in our common yard.

Alas, the dog problem is not confined to my neighbourhood, especially now that owning a dog seems associated with the good life in Israel. I have no hard figures to go by, but I'm convinced that in the past five years, the country's dog population has increased much faster than its human counterpart. Everywhere you walk in Jerusalem – and for that matter in Tel Aviv too – the proof on the sidewalks and in the parks is clear to the eye, nose and ear.

But my beef with dogs goes beyond their noise pollution and mounds of excrement. As a daily bicycle rider to and from work, my affinity for these animals has severely waned after so many run-ins with dogs in hot pursuit of a piece of my flesh.

Now, before a pack of animal rights activists also comes after me for blackening the holy name of dogs, I acknowledge that not all are like those described above.

As a former dog lover myself, I admit there are many fine, upstanding pooches in this world, including in Israel. Many toil selflessly in the service of blind people, work with disturbed children, keep elderly company, and even help police foil terror attacks by sniffing out bombs. This is all well and good and deserving of praise. But sadly those are in the minority and they are no reason for us to suffer from their less noble cousins.

Agreed, the problem begins and ends with their masters. And that's what's so distressing. For in Israel, too many dog owners just don't care. As in other areas of life here, many people demonstrate a shameless disregard for their fellow citizens. Now that's something worth barking about, even on Yom Kippur.

The Kirshner File

Violence turns back the clock in the Mideast

It seemed as if the clock had been turned back to a time when Israel and its Arab neighbours were locked in a deathly struggle. Last week, Israel was so besieged by a seething orgy of Arab hostility and violence that a frenzy seemed to have taken hold in the Arab world.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip were on the rampage, confronting Israeli soldiers and policemen in orchestrated and spontaneous bloody clashes reminiscent of the 1987-1993 intifadah. The murder of two Israeli soldiers by vigilantes in Ramallah, followed by Israeli retaliatory attacks on buildings and facilities in the Palestinian autonomous areas, heightened fears of a full-scale war.

Israeli Arabs, having called a general strike, fought with their fellow Jewish citizens in what some observers described as an incipient revolt.

In Arab capitals – Rabat, Cairo, Amman, Kuwait City – mobs burned Israeli flags and bitterly denounced Israel in a gruesome display of visceral hatred that harkened back to the days preceding the Six Day War.

As the tension increased, the satanic Saddam Hussein, he of the Scud missiles, offered to eradicate Israel on condition that Iraq was given a piece of land adjacent to the Israeli border.

With the fires burning fiendishly, Hezbollah kidnapped three Israeli soldiers in territory claimed by Lebanon, and Prime Minister Ehud Barak warned the Lebanese and Syrian governments that he held them responsible for the soldiers' fate.

In the aftermath of these ominous events, the Middle East lurched closer to a disaster, notwithstanding the best efforts of a parade of international mediators to extinguish the flames.

At stake was the fundamental stability of the region as well as the very future of the Oslo peace process, plunged into a state of suspension and uncertainty following the collapse of the Camp David summit in July.

Barak, whose frayed government is now but a pale shadow of itself and whose days as Israel's leader may be numbered, must wonder what went wrong so suddenly.

He took office in 1999 with the sublime conviction that he could make peace with Syria and the Palestinians. When the Syrian track fell by the wayside last winter, he turned his undivided attention to securing an agreement with Yasser Arafat of the Palestinian Authority. There was progress, as Barak gradually fulfilled promises broken by his predecessor, Benjamin Netanyahu. But once the two sides entered into final status negotiations over such crucial core issues as borders, Palestinian refugees, Jewish settlements and Jerusalem, the difficulties mounted inexorably.

Unable to break the impasse, Barak and Arafat agreed to try to resolve their yawning differences at Camp David under the auspices of the United States. President Bill Clinton came tantalizingly close to brokering a historic deal, thanks in large part to Barak's sweeping concessions. Arafat, however, balked, refusing to accept face-saving compromise proposals on eastern Jerusalem and on the refugee issue. Shaken by his obduracy, Clinton laid the blame at Arafat's doorstep. Subsequent efforts by the United States to bridge the gap between Barak's and Arafat's positions, and to elicit support from such moderate Arab countries as Egypt, Morocco and Saudi Arabia, floundered.

Convinced that diplomacy was now of little use in achieving his goals, and concerned by the growing perception that the Palestinians were at fault for the deadlock, Arafat resorted to a weapon of last resort – violence.

To Arafat, violence is a useful device. The intifadah not only disabused Israel of the misplaced idea that it could maintain its occupation of the West Bank and Gaza with impunity, but also forced Israel to the negotiating table. Furthermore, Hezbollah's success in routing the Israeli army from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon left a profound impression on Arafat.

At Oslo, Arafat solemnly pledged to foreswear violence to achieve his ends. But he cast this promise aside in 1996 and again in 1998 by winking at two major Palestinian eruptions, or "days of rage." Ariel Sharon, the confrontational Likud leader, played into Arafat's hands with an ill-advised and politically motivated visit to the disputed Temple Mount. Armed with a pretext, Arafat yet again unleashed the fury of the Palestinian street, fed up and frustrated by the slow pace and relatively meagre results of the peace process.

After seven years of on-again, off-again negotiations, the Palestinian Authority has comparatively little to show for its efforts. Much of the West Bank is still under Israel's administration (the Palestinians fully control 18 percent of it), though the bulk of Gaza is controlled by Arafat. Despite massive infusions of foreign aid, the Palestinian economy is anemic, possibly owing to widespread corruption and inefficiency, and unemployment remains shockingly high.

These problems, however grave and in dire need of remedy, quickly faded into the woodwork as a concerted wave of anti-Israeli violence, the worst since 1967, inundated the West Bank and Gaza.

The outpouring of unadulterated Palestinian venom, combined with the sacking of Joseph's Tomb, a Jewish religious shrine in Nablus handed over by Israel to the Palestinian Authority for safekeeping, have shaken Israel's confidence and trust in the Palestinians as a reliable partner and in the peace process itself. If passions subside, Barak and Arafat can eventually resume peace talks, since the alternative of never-ending bloodshed is too terrible a notion to contemplate.

Ehud Barak

For now, since the release of Hamas and Islamic Jihad captives in Palestinian prisons, Israelis should gird themselves for a renewal of suicide bombings, the last of which occurred in 1997. They should also prepare themselves for a steady stream of anti-Israel resolutions from the upcoming Arab summit in Cairo, scheduled to be held later this month.

The events of the past two and a half weeks have also concentrated Israel's mind on a long neglected, simmering internal problem. Within hours of the uprising in the West Bank and Gaza, Israeli Arabs from north to south took to the streets, building barricades, throwing stones and firebombs, blocking roads, trashing shops and government offices and, in two separate instances, trying to set fire to a synagogue and a school. In some cases, Jews and Arabs fought pitched battles, raising the ugly and until now unimaginable spectre of civil war in Israel.

These incidents, the worst communal disorders in Israel's history, claimed the lives of 13 Arabs and one Jew as of last week. Israel has not seen such riots since 1976, when six Arabs were killed while protesting Israel's land expropriation policy.

The disturbances, which lapped into Arab towns and villages like Umm el-Fahm or Shfaram, spilled into such mixed Arab-Jewish communities as Nazareth, Jaffa, Ramle, Lod and Haifa. Not since the British Mandate period had there been turbulence on this scale.

Israel's Arab citizens – a minority of one million comprising almost 20 percent of its overall population – were roused into militancy for two reasons.

First, they were demonstrating solidarity with their fellow Palestinians in the territories, a development which raised sombre questions about their loyalty and prompted a flood of commentaries about the existence of a fifth column in Israel. It is no surprise that Arabs in Israel support the Palestinian cause. They came out in favour of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza long ago. But they crossed a red line by resorting to widespread violence. And are they crossing another red line by continually demanding that Israel transform itself from a Jewish state into a "country of its citizens"?

Second, Israeli Arabs were revolting against the status quo. "We are aware of the great frustration of Arab citizens," said Barak in an understatement shortly after the rioting began. Although they enjoy equal rights under the law, they are in fact second-class citizens. Their lands have been expropriated, though not of late. Their municipalities do not receive a fair share of government allocations and thus often lack basic services, giving them an impoverished Third World appearance. And Arabs are subjected to discrimination in employment and housing.

Among the Bedouins, half of whom live in unrecognized encampments and are therefore not entitled to welfare benefits, the situation is far worse. Last January, Colette Avital, a Labour party member of the Knesset, warned of a full-blown intifadah unless their problems were seriously addressed.

Barak, who won about 95 percent of the Arab vote in the last election, has belatedly convened a special committee to study the needs of Israeli Arabs. There is much work to be done, and urgently. But in the meantime, Israel is on the brink of war with the Palestinians.

Rabbi blows shofar to wake up taxpayers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Rabbi Michael Dolgin, spiritual leader of Temple Sinai, blew a shofar at Queen's Park recently, it was a "wake-up call" to Ontario taxpayers.

The rabbi is part of a multi-faith campaign titled Don't Endorse It! Donate It!, which urges taxpayers to donate their cheque from the Mike Harris government, to charity.

At a press conference held the day before the first cheques were due to be mailed, Rev. Eleanor Barrington, one of the campaign's organizers, said that for five years "the government of Ontario has been reducing funding and support to the most vulnerable people in our province: children on welfare, families escaping domestic violence, the developmentally challenged, social housing communities, the elderly and the poor.

People urged to donate cheques

"Now they take tax dollars saved at such great human expense and give away $200 cheques to the people who make enough to pay taxes. The families who need it the most get none of it."

An e-mail being circulated and reprinted in the bulletins of many faith communities suggests people donate their maximum $200 cheque to a charitable organization that supports social housing and the homeless, or other urgent social needs.

It also includes a letter challenging the Ontario government to match each donation, and do its job of taking care of the vulnerable people.

Rabbi Dolgin said it is the job of the government to look after social welfare, not the job of religious groups. "We must live up to our responsibilities and assist in moments of crisis, yet it is the responsibility of the government to provide for a strong infrastructure," he said.

"It is essential for the government to live up to the responsibility of [taking care of] the poor of this province. If a private company had a leak in its roof, the management would be expected to fix it – not the workers."

It is astonishing, he said, "that in a province where childhood poverty and homelessness has reached such levels, and where there is a lack of affordable housing, that the government would choose to send this kind of dividend to private individuals.

"People who receive this money are not needy. We have to hope that they will use the money to help the needy," he said.

The press conference was called, he said, not to blame the current government [for the poverty] "but to demand what they government plans to do to remedy the situation.

"We want people to know that social welfare is the government's responsibility, and that as we receive the money, it is our ethical responsibility to use it to help the downtrodden."

Rabbi Michael Dolgin blows shofar at Queen's Park.

In a symbolic gesture, Kira Heineck, of the Toronto Disaster Relief Committee, held a cardboard "roof" over her head, which members of the multi-faith community "shingled" with mock cheques.

"With lots of donations, we can build good roof, but what only the government / resources to do, is build the foundation supports. That will end homelessness," Rev. Barrington.

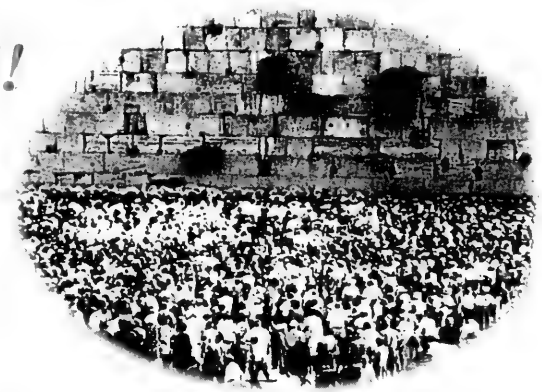
"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem..."

We shall never forget!!

Concern is our natural response when Israel is in crisis. That feeling transcends all of our external differences.

At this difficult time for Israel, we invite you to join together in solidarity with all of her concerned children by once again investing in and ensuring a strong and independent Israel.

As we pray for peace, we will not forget thee, O Jerusalem.



Now is the time to reaffirm our eternal bond. We must all help ensure Israel's security.

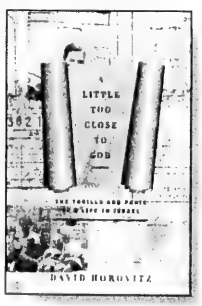
Pained cri de coeur

From the editor's desk

David Horovitz is a captivating, engaging, articulate individual who has spent the majority of his adult life as a journalist observing the myriad maddening, elevating, contradictory and achingly poignant aspects of life in modern Israel.

First as a reporter for the Jerusalem Post and now as the editor of the bi-weekly Jerusalem Report, Horovitz has been immersed in Anglo-Israeli journalism since the mid-1980s, an immersion that has bred in him, among other qualities, a fine eye for detail and an attachment to candour.

Thus, detail and candour are the two chief hallmarks of A Little Too Close To God: The thrills and panic of a life in Israel, Horovitz's revealing 300-page account of and insight into his family's day-to-day existence in Israel, recently published by Alfred A. Knopf, New York.



The depiction of his family's life, however, is of course a literary device, a metaphor Horovitz uses for the depiction of Israeli life. The hopes and aspirations he harbours for his family are thus the hopes and aspirations he harbours for Israel. The disappointments in his home are the disappointments about his home – Israel.

Horovitz is so open and so revealing about his life that at times we feel almost like intruders into too personal a domain, as for example, when he recounts for the reader some of the differences of opinion between him and his wife on any number of vital familial issues or when he allows the reader to know his innermost private thoughts on the many difficult, sensitive subjects – such as the terror-filled contemplation by a parent of the possible death of a child – that for Israelis, unfortunately, are inescapable.

The book is an intense, quick read because of its compelling subject matter, and because it is so well written. Horovitz alternates the tone of the text along an arcing range between crisp narrative and homespun, folksy anecdote.

He is always reflective and always drawing the reader into the dilemmas – economic, political, existential – with which his conscience must constantly struggle. But Horovitz also offsets those dilemmas with numerous intercessions of humour. He uses comic relief as a balancing instrument helping to ensure the lively pace of the book, but also as an occasional respite for the reader's emotions.

It is apparent that Horovitz is often pained and hurt at what he is describing about Israeli life, its failures, its vanities, its frustrations and its dangers.

At its core, however, the book is a cri de coeur about the peace process.

The peace process is a lightning rod for the issues that infuse Horovitz's life in Israel, sparking debate within his workplace, his circle of friends, his home and even within himself. It is the seminal issue for Horovitz; he uses it almost like a touchstone, a marker gauging the extent to which his Zionist dreams have been fulfilled.

Horovitz is a self-described, quintessential peace process "dove." He proclaims his political loyalties early in the book and frequently. His partisan good will towards Ehud Barak (and the assassinated Yitzhak Rabin) is matched only by his partisan disdain for Benjamin Netanyahu.

Owing undoubtedly to Horovitz' formative years in England and Europe, where political orientations are embedded earlier and more deeply in the culture than in Canada, and to the effect of some 15 years of immersion in Israeli political affairs, Horovitz writes about politics in Israel with a gravity and severity that is not generally common to the North American reader.

But despite the occasional "exaggeration" of the language, the analysis is always sophisticated and always balanced. Horovitz presents both sides of the debate, regardless of the issue. To escape the possible charge of filtering or distorting the "other side of the argument," Horovitz presents opposing views through the mouths of the friends and family who espouse them.

And true to conscience, he has the integrity and the honesty to admit that he is often perplexed by the issues, that the answers are not always obvious.

And that is why A Little Too Close To God is an important book to read. No issue is more important for Israel at the moment than the peace process, especially so, in light of the potentially cataclysmic violence that has gripped Israel in the last three weeks.

"Don't tell me," Horovitz pleads, "that the very idea of a partnership for peace with the Palestinians is impossible, because fragile though it may have been, it was developing."

The reader is left to wonder whether recent events have changed Horovitz's mind, whether Yasser Arafat's actions have put the lie, once and for all, to Yasser Arafat's words. -MBD

Lipstadt to open Holocaust Education Week

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Organizers are putting the finishing touches to this year's 20th annual Holocaust Education Week, which promises to be the biggest, most extensive such event to date.

The 12 days will feature 111 programs, lectures, talks by survivors and cultural events, to be augmented by over a dozen pre and post programs.

As well, Bravo TV will air seven Holocaust-related films, and 24 bookstores in and around Toronto will display books on the same theme.

"It seems to grow more and more every year," says Holocaust Education Week 2000 chair Barbara Rusch. "That's because of the commitment of the Jewish community, as well as the Christian community. More churches are hosting events this year than ever before."

The opening-night program this time will not mark a milestone of a specific war-era event. (Opening nights in years past commemorated the anniversaries of the voyages of the ships Exodus and St. Louis, and of Kristallnacht).

But this year's opening promises to be no less notable. It will feature an address from Prof. Deborah Lipstadt, the Emory University historian who was sued by notorious British Holocaust denier David Irving in a case that made headlines around the world.

Lipstadt, in her bestselling book Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, focused special attention on Irving as one of the world's most pernicious deniers of the Holocaust's extent. Irving sued for libel, and a British court not only vindicated Lipstadt, but also eviscerated Irving for deliberately misrepresenting and distorting historical evidence to fit his views. As well, the court ordered him to pay costs, leading many to speculate he would be bankrupted.

Deborah Lipstadt

Lipstadt will appear at Adath Israel Congregation (37 Southbourne Ave.) on Oct. 28 at 8:30 p.m.

Other programs of note will include:

• Elinor Caplan, federal minister of citizenship and immigration, will address a pre-Holocaust Education Week program on the prosecution of alleged war criminals (Oct. 27, noon, Sheraton Hotel, 123 Queen St., W.). The luncheon is presented by the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada.

• Prof. Gary Evans of the University of Ottawa will deliver a lecture on Canadian-produced film and videos of the Holocaust from World War II to the present (Oct. 29, 10:30 a.m. at 15 Hove St.,) while on the same day at 2 p.m. at Beth Habonim Congregation (5 Glen Park Ave.), Evans' wife, Prof. Karin Doerr, who teaches German at Concordia University in Montreal, will examine a little-explored area: "Nazi-Deutsch," or how the German language was used to terrorize and degrade Jews, and how those Jews faced the dilemma of their mother tongue being used as a weapon against them.

• The Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto will present its main event Oct. 29 at 7 p.m. at the University of Toronto's Emmanuel College. The Robert Engel Memorial Lecture, which pays tribute to the late Toronto Holocaust educator, will feature Victoria Barnett, a consultant to the church relations department of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. The Engel lecture is planned as an annual event.

• Claude Lanzmann, the celebrated filmmaker of Shoah, will screen and discuss his latest work: an interview with Maurice Rossel, a former Red Cross official. Rossel was the only representative of the Red Cross to visit Auschwitz when it was a working death camp, but claimed to have witnessed no horrors there, or at Theresienstadt. Lanzmann reveals Rossel's anti-Semitism, which likely influenced the reports he submitted to the Red Cross. (Oct. 31, 7:30 p.m., Centre for Jewish Studies, York University).

• U of T Prof. Michael Marrus will speak about the Vatican and the deportation of the Jews of Rome (Holy Blossom Temple, Nov. 6, 8 p.m.), while Prof. Robert-Jan Van Pelt of the University of Waterloo's school of architecture, and a witness in the defence of Deborah Lipstadt, will give an account of Irving's cross-examination in the case (Nov. 7, 7:30 p.m., 750 Spadina Ave.).

• The week will close Nov. 9, the 52nd anniversary of Kristallnacht, with a community commemoration of the event that presaged the Holocaust and a lecture by Prof. Marion Kaplan of City University in New York on German Jewry in the wake of Kristallnacht (8 p.m., BAYT Congregation, 613 Clark Ave., Thornhill).

In between will be personal testimonies from over two dozen local survivors, some of whom have penned their memoirs, as well as an array of films, readings, dance and music.

The David Story: A Translation with Commentary of 1 and 2 Samuel*, by Robert Alter, Canbook, $42 HC

Give Us a King! Samuel, Saul and David: A New Translation of Samuel I and II*, by Everett Fox, Random House, $38 HC

King David*, by Jonathan Kirsch, Random House, $42 HC

Until 1993, there was no historical or archaeological evidence, outside the Hebrew Scriptures, to substantiate the existence of an Israelite king named David. This changed with the discovery of a wall fragment found at Tel Dan in northern Israel, near the headwaters of the Jordan River. The Phoenician script carved in stone appears to refer to "the King of Israel" and to "the House of David" (Beit David).

Although this fragment, now in Jerusalem's Israel Museum, has provoked considerable disagreement, most scholars believe it is the first mention of a Davidic dynasty outside the Bible.

David is perhaps the most commanding figure in the Hebrew Scriptures. His name is mentioned more than a thousand times and more space is devoted to him than to any other biblical figure.

He has been the subject of innumerable portraits — both artistic and literary. Michaelangelo's sculpture of him is perhaps the best known work of art in the world.

Robert Alter and Everett Fox are both eminent biblical scholars with a gift for commentary and translation. Their new, creative and masterful translations of the books of Samuel I and II provide for the general reader an enhanced understanding and appreciation of the original Hebrew.

Steven McKenzie is a professor of Hebrew Bible; Jonathan Kirsch is a journalist and amateur scholar whose previous works are Moses and The Harlot by the Side of the Road. Both attempt vivid and plausible biographies of a complex and many-sided personality by filling in the spare Hebrew narrative with inventive details and narrative bridges.

McKenzie is more restrained and conservative in his approach. Kirsch includes rather sensational scholarly conjectures. Both, however, regard David as an aggressive leader, devious politician and ruthless war chief.

David's story, writes McKenzie, "reads more like a modern soap opera with plenty of sex, violence and struggles for power."

McKenzie makes clear that one can never know for certain what actually happened in David's lifetime. One can only make educated guesses. He declares that his biography recognizes that the biblical story is designed to idealize David by justifying his actions.

So he, the biographer, must replace the biblical explanations of David's motives with others that are more in line with what we know of ancient Middle Eastern rulers and of human nature in general. He states: "Our biography of David, therefore, is not an exact recounting of history, but ... a plausible tale."

Over the centuries, a multitude of images of David have emerged. These four books of translation, interpretation and biography offer a new portrait — not, of course, without controversy — for our own time.

Jewish Life

Judaism, water and rain

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We are well into the holiday of Sukkot and as people dine and entertain under a canopy of branches, they check the skies for threatening clouds.

Ironic because this Saturday, on Shemini Atzeret, Jews will recite a very special prayer to be blessed with rain. Today, the special relationship between this holiday season, rain, water and the Jews.

As Amnon Bazak points out in Sukkot and the Attributes of Justice [http://www.vjholidays.com/sukkot/haretz.htm], rain is often seen in the Torah as a blessing and its absence, a curse. If the people of Israel turn away to serve other gods, "the anger of God will burn against you, and He will shut up the heavens and you will have no rain" (Deuteronomy 11:17). But if the nation listens to God's commandments, then "I shall give the rain of your land in its time; the early rain and the late rain" (Deut. 11:14).

Sukkot itself is tied very closely to water. One of the happiest ceremonies in Jewish tradition took place during this holiday. While the Temple was standing, a special water-pouring ceremony called Simchat Bet HaShoavah was held on Sukkot. The drawing of the water was performed with such intense joy that the following saying remains a testament: "He who has not seen the rejoicing at the Simchat Bet HaShoavah, has never seen rejoicing in his life." [http://www.ou.org/chagim/sukkot/libations.htm]

And while we're thinking about drawing water with joy, now's the perfect time to listen to the most famous song on the topic, Mayim, Mayim. [http://members.aol.com/sellea/private/mayimmym.mid] The song draws its lyrics from Isaiah 12:3, "With joy you will draw water / From the wells of salvation." [http: //www.breslov.com/ref/Isaiah1.htm]

For people taking time off during the middle of Sukkot, Shelly Frier has a seasonal piece of advice: Take a hike! And perform a water-related ritual at the same time.

Although the tradition of tashlich – during which sins are symbolically cast away into the water – is most closely associated with Rosh Hashanah, Frier points out that it can be performed until Hoshanah Rabba, the final day of Sukkot. "So take your family out to water. Picnic by the sea, hike to a stream, or go canoeing if the weather is right. Don't forget your siddur, and a pocket full of crumbs." [http://www. jewishtravel.com/family/sukkot.html].

Chancellor Ismar Schorsch of the Jewish Theological Seminary explains that after the fate of each individual has been determined between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, God now weighs the merits of the community as a whole. "Does its collective record of decency over the past year warrant the blessing of abundant rain?" [http://www.learn.jtsa.edu/topics/parashah/5756/sukkot.shtml]

"And so Sukkot is more than a joyous thanksgiving festival at the end of an ample harvest. The mood of gratitude and celebration is accompanied by an undertone of anxiety. Will this year's rainfall be large enough to guarantee a repetition of last year's bounty? Over the eight-day holiday, what begins inaudibly swells into a crescendo of supplications for rain on the final two days of Hoshanah Rabah and Shemini Atzeret."

Once Sukkot is formally over and we are no longer at risk of getting soaked during our outdoor dinners, Jews pray for a fall and winter blessed with plenty of rain in the Land of Israel [http://www.ou.org/chagim/shmini-simchat/geshem.htm]. Tefilat Geshem is a beautiful prayer that shows how crucial water has been to the heroes of the Torah. For example: "Remember the one [Moses] drawn forth in a bulrush basket from the water. They said, 'He drew water and provided the sheep with water.' At the time Your treasured people thirsted for water, he struck the rock and out came water. For the sake of his righteousness, grant abundant water!" The prayer ends with the entire congregation praying "For a blessing, not a curse. For life and not for death. For abundance, not for famine."

And from that day until Passover in the spring, Jews continue to pray for rain three times each weekday.

Have their prayers been heard? It may not always be easy to tell. But you can get a good idea if you go to Israel's Channel Two news Web site and check out the latest weather conditions [http://www.israelnews2.co.il/weather/].

Israel through the lens of Galut

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

There are few more complex problems in Jewish education than reflecting upon the significance of Israel as both a political and a theological entity, issues that are compounded when they are refracted through the lens of galut (Diaspora).

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The very word "Israel" has flexible usage within Judaism. It is a land, a physical and geographical entity, but in modern times it has also become a state, a national political framework. The State of Israel was largely the result of a secular project to create a national haven for Jews, especially in the wake of modern anti-Semitism, which culminated in the Holocaust.

The "Land of Israel" has always been a part of Jewish religious aspiration, especially since the exile of the Jewish nation under the Roman occupation in the early centuries of the Common Era.

In modern day Israel a complex series of factors thus intersect. The desire of Jews to live in Israel as a democratic and largely secular state stands next to the view of certain religious Zionists and others that the Jews should be sovereign over every inch of the Land of Israel and incorporate that land into the political state, seeing the two terms as thus inseparable. Is the Land of Israel inherently holy?

As the student considers the origin of the Jewish claim to the Land of Israel and the promise God initially makes to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob that Jews shall inherit this land, certain fundamental questions must be brought up for consideration. Is the promise conditional – does it depend on fulfilment of mitzvot – or is it unconditional? Does the promise have a time limit or can it be fulfilled at any time in history? And if religious observance is a key to understanding the Jewish right to the land, then is a secular Israel a contradiction in terms? What part should religion play in Israeli national life?

Further complications abound. How must Judaism adapt to the demands of power? The principle which often underlies the Jewish ethical outlook is to be found in the Torah in several places: "You should neither vex a stranger nor oppress him, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt." (Exodus 22:20)

It is not an accident that slavery constitutes the origins of the Jewish people. Many Torah commentaries observe that God organized Jewish history in that manner so as to imprint permanently on the Jewish soul the memory of bad times and ill treatment received from the Egyptian oppressor; this, in turn, was to inspire Jews never to treat others in a similar fashion.

Some would apply this teaching to the Israeli treatment of the Palestinians, but is the analogy appropriate? Are they the "strangers" of biblical concern, or enemies to be defended against, if not attacked?

As I write this, war threatens yet again in the Middle East. Education is not a topical affair but hopefully a thoughtful quest for a long-term vision of reality. When the military dust settles, teacher and student must return to the perhaps more difficult task of placing Israel's current dilemmas in the larger context of not only Jewish history, but Judaism itself.

Dr. Carol Herbert practises what she preaches

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – When the president of the University of Western Ontario, Paul Davenport, appointed Dr. Carol Herbert as dean of the faculty of medicine and dentistry about a year ago, he said, "She will make a difference."

She has launched a series of initiatives designed to heighten the university's profile and to improve medical and dental care in the community.

Academia

First and foremost, Herbert has established an innovative program to extend the benefits of medical care to rural regions in southwest Ontario.

"Such programs address the real needs of communities to recruit and retain physicians," explained Herbert, believed to be Canada's first Jewish medical dean of her gender.

In line with this philosophy, the dental school is operating outreach clinics for what she describes as "the urban underserved."

And, since Canada requires more doctors, she and her fellow deans across the country have undertaken a campaign to increase enrolment. "We expect Western to receive a significant infusion of new students next year."

Herbert, a 54-year-old native of Vancouver, is also cementing the partnership between medical and dentistry education and research.

"Not many schools are organized in one faculty like ours," she noted. "It is an opportunity for cross-training we are just beginning to appreciate. For starters, I expect to see joint education in bioethics and cultural issues."

Meanwhile, she is building on the accomplishments of the university's biomedical research facility.

"We have to set priorities and we are doing so, paying attention to educational and health services research as well as more traditional biomedical research."

A leader in child and women's health issues, she practised medicine from 1971 until 1999.

"Now I go into the family practice unit one-half day a week to supervise residents."

Although she misses practising medicine on a day-to-day basis, Herbert likes being an administrator.

"Administration is challenging, since I want to lead, not only manage. I enjoy creating an environment where my faculty can do their best work."

Herbert, a member of London's Or Shalom synagogue, acquired her fundraising skills as a volunteer for Vancouver's Jewish communjty. There, she served on the boards of the shul and the Talmud Torah.

Not surprisingly, she works long hours. "I'm in the office or at a meeting by 7 or 7:30 a.m., and home by 6:30 or 7 p.m. I usually work a couple of evenings a week and one afternoon on the weekend. Since I have to travel a fair bit, there is always e-mail to catch up on, which takes still more time."

Social events permit Herbert and her husband, Fred, a realtor, to go out together and catch up on events.

"I can only do my best at this job because of his terrific support. He was willing to relocate to London after we had both lived our whole lives in Vancouver."

Herbert, the second of four daughters, praised her parents, David and Rochelle Chertkow, as role models. They taught her and her sisters a golden rule she has never forgotten: a duty to give back to the community.

Carol Herbert

She was drawn to medicine for a compelling reason. "It allowed me to blend my skills and interests in science and the humanities with my interest and commitment to helping people."

A graduate of the University of British Columbia, she chose family medicine because it is so people oriented. "One gets to know patients as persons over time. The hallmark of family medicine is the patient-physician relationship. It's the only medical discipline for which that relationship is the defining characteristic."

Herbert, who received her medical degree in 1969, was a family medicine doctor at a community health centre before joining the University of British Columbia's family practice department in 1982 as a professor.

In Vancouver, she was a pioneer in providing services for sexually abused children. "I started medical intervention programs in B.C. that others carry on today. I was part of a group which developed models for managing sexual abuse in rural communities."

In addition, she participated in a diabetes prevention and education project involving the Haida people.

A visiting professor at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev last year, Herbert has been immersed in primary care research for almost three decades now.

"In terms of progress, we have moved light years since I started in 1971, but there is still far to go," she said. "Primary care researchers have an opportunity to ask questions in a community context and to follow patients over many years."

Today, in her new position at the University of Western Ontario, Herbert can practise what she preaches.

As she put it: "I believe that the medical and dental schools have a social contract to educate professionals who can meet community needs."

With that credo as her guiding light, Herbert intends to make Western a beacon in medical and dental education in Ontario and the rest of Canada.

Reena ElderHome opens its doors in Thornhill

THORNHILL — Over 200 dignitaries, well-wishers and families of Reena clients gathered recently for the opening of the Al and Faye Mintz Reena ElderHome, located in Thornhill.

The Crestwood Road building will house 16 older residents who have been attending recreational and day programs at the nearby Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre. The ElderHome will cater specifically to the needs of older adults with developmental disabilities, and is the first such facility in Canada.

The specially equipped, 9,000-square-foot residence will offer computer training and exercise equipment to encourage clients to be as active as possible.

According to Reena, which opened its first residence for adults 23 years ago, about one-third of its clients are now more than 50 years old.

In less than a decade, more than half of all Reena clients will be senior citizens. Most nursing homes and residences for the aged do not meet the needs of seniors with developmental disabilities, Reena says.

Reena currently supports about 1,000 clients, including 225 individuals in 22 residences and 50 apartment units, all in a Jewish environment.

The ElderHome, which is wheelchair-accessible, will allow older adults to age with dignity in their own community, Reena says.

For details, call 905-763-8254.

New CYJ shaliach calls for ongoing youth dialogue

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is essential for Canadian and Israeli youth to have ongoing dialogue, says the new national shaliach for Canadian Young Judaea.

"Israeli youth need to see the reality of life outside Israel, and Canadian youth need to learn more about Israel," says Israel Pupko, 29.

He recently succeeded Ryan Hass, who returned to Israel with his family after his term as shaliach ended.

One of the first programs Pupko is overseeing is a mifgash for 14 youths, ages 15 and 16. This fall, teens from Israel are coming here for 12 days to meet their Canadian counterparts, and in December, Canadian youth are going to Israel.

While here, the Israeli youth will visit CHAT to meet with students and talk about the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora, and Canada and Israel.

The Canadians will take part in an international youth conference in Israel where they will meet with delegates from such places as Jordan and the Palestinian Authority.

"In the last few years, there have been conflicts between different groups in Israeli society. Sometimes these conflicts have an impact on the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora.

"It is important to have as intense a dialogue as possible, in order to get to know each other, and learn from each other's experiences," he said.

Pupko was born in Mexico, where he joined the youth Zionist movement as a preteen. He made aliyah when he was 20, and while in university, worked as a counsellor for Latin American students. "I helped in the social part of the immigration process – helping them get settled into Israeli society."

He later worked for Melitz, a non-profit organization that runs seminars for students and new immigrants about topics including Jewish history, the Holocaust, and Israeli and Jewish identity.

Israel Pupko

"I find working with youth exciting. Whoever plants seeds now, will benefit from the fruits in a few years. That is why I am in this field," says Pupko.

During his term as shaliach, he will promote Canadian Young Judaea on university campuses where he will run discussions and social evenings, and he will oversee a junior program every three weeks.

"Belonging to an organization is good for kids. They become part of a family of which they can be proud."

His duties also include being director of Camp Solelim in Sudbury, Canadian Young Judaea's summer camp for 14 and 15 year olds.

"We are going to have a central theme – which will be kept as a surprise until camp begins – and most activities will revolve around that theme, and around Jewish current events."

He visited the camp for two weeks this past summer and he enjoyed seeing the campers happy to be with other Jewish youth, and learning about Jewish and Zionist subjects, he says.

"I intend to try and bring this camp experience back to the city, at the end of the summer. I don't want it to end there."

Lawyer fights for Israeli pensioners

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of older Israelis living in Canada are entitled to old-age and disability pensions they are being denied, says an Israeli lawyer living in Toronto.

Itamar Cohen says he is going to bat for several clients who are being denied Israeli government pensions because they left the country.

He and his partner in Israel are considering a class-action lawsuit to force the Israeli government to pay pensions to those who left the country at relatively advanced ages.

"It's not fair," Cohen says. "They paid into it for years and now Israel is saying no."

In Israel, all workers pay into a general social insurance fund called Bituach Le'umi (the National Insurance). From this pool, they draw old-age and disability pensions, maternity leave payments, and payments when they are called up for military service.

But Israel contends that applicants for pensions must be residents of Israel at the time of application. That, says Cohen, disqualifies Israelis living abroad.

Women in Israel begin collecting old-age pensions at age 60; men start at 65. Monthly payments amount to between $400 and $500 (Cdn). Almost all Israelis supplement that with private pension plans, Cohen explains.

"But it's still something," he says. "Israelis who come to Canada at around age 50 or 55 are stuck. They don't qualify for Canadian old-age pensions and they can't get their pensions from Israel."

He feels that access to government pensions should apply to all Israeli citizens, no matter where they live and where they apply.

Cohen is emboldened by a ruling last month by Israel's High Court of Justice, which gave the ministries of labour and social affairs three months to say whether they will extend the categories of those eligible for state-funded old-age pensions to Israelis who have left the country.

But it could be years before new regulations kick in if the government agrees to pay Israelis abroad, Cohen says.

The Knesset is currently considering a bill that will pay old-age pensions to those who live abroad temporarily, such as shlichim (organizational emissaries).

Cohen feels the current system discriminates against those who left Israel permanently. In most cases, they came to Canada to be with children and grandchildren, and many have continued paying into the national fund via automatic bank withdrawals in Israel.

The current structure also discourages people from leaving Israel, thus infringing on their freedom of movement, Cohen says.

Israelis living in several European countries have no such problem because those countries have signed treaties with Israel. Cohen says there is no agreement between Canada and Israel governing state pensions.

One case before him concerns an older couple who came to Canada about 20 years ago after living in Israel since 1945. About two years after their arrival in Toronto, the wife, a Holocaust survivor, suffered a brain injury and was incapacitated. The couple applied for disability payments and old-age pensions from Israel, which they had paid into for 35 years. But they were denied because they were no longer deemed Israeli citizens.

Israel's argument is that a citizen is someone whose "primary" life is in Israel, "has acknowledged his intent of living in Israel, and has expressed a perceptible wish to do so."

Cohen advises those who may be affected to consult a lawyer who is familiar with Israeli law.

Toronto gets female halachic consultant

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto is home to one of the first women to be certified as a yoetzet halachah, a halachic consultant.

Ilana Sober is one of only nine women to graduate from Israel's Keren Ariel, a special course within Nishmat, the Jerusalem Centre for Advanced Torah Study for Women.

Sober will be teaching a five-week course for Toronto's Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women titled From Mishnah to Mikvah: Case Studies in Family Purity.

Classes will be held on Wednesday evenings from Nov. 1 to Nov. 29, from 8 to 10 p.m., at Beth Jacob Synagogue.

To become a halachic consultant, a woman must take advanced courses in Talmud, classic rabbinic texts, and contemporary responsa.

There is also training in psychology; marriage counselling; and gynecology, including hormones, fertility, reproductive technology, sexuality and prenatal testing.

The Keren Ariel program requires 1,000 hours of study over two years, and culminates with a four-hour oral exam.

The consultants do not make halachic decisions.

A media release explains that their role is to "advise and educate women on both the theoretical and practical aspects of the laws of family purity, and to act as a liaison between women and rabbinic decision-makers."

Since the practical applications of these laws involve very intimate matters, many women are reluctant to consult male rabbinic authorities.

Consultants "help a woman to clearly formulate the details of her individual situation by asking the right sorts of questions," and then "frame the question precisely so as to provide the rabbinic decision-makers with the information they need."

Sober says that another aspect of her work is to promote a better understanding of this area of Jewish law.

Use etrogs for Sukkot cakes

By LINDA MOREL
Special to The CJN

Every Jewish kid in the area wants to visit our sukkah, says professional baker and restaurant bakery consultant Marcy Goldman of Montreal. Preparing for young and old arriving in tours, she and her three sons decorate their hut to the hilt.

"We're the most popular stop on the field trip list."

Besides having an outrageous abundance of fruits and vegetables hung on walls, they are not shy about spreading etrogs, a variety of the citron, inside.

Because Sukkot began as a holiday for gathering fruit, Jews today decorate their temporary huts with produce. No celebration would be complete without examples of the Four Species, which once represented all growing things in the world.

The Four Species include a lulav – the youngest branch of a palm tree – a willow branch, a myrtle bush branch and an etrog. The willow and myrtle branches are tied around the lulav, while the etrog is kept in a special, well-padded container, which may be a simple wooden box with a straw lining or an ornate model with intricate filigree and a hinged lid.

Holding the Four Species, participants shake the lulav in all directions and say prayers of thanks to God for the good things they receive from the earth.

Etrogs became part of Sukkot festivals to fulfil the biblical commandment in Leviticus 23: "And ye shall take you on the first day the fruit of a beautiful tree and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days." The Hebrew phrase pri eitz hadar, literally "the fruit of a beautiful tree," has always been identified with the etrog.

A rare commodity in North America, etrogs are mysterious to many people, who don't know what they look like or that they add surprising snap to recipes.

"Actually a fresh etrog resembles a very fat lemon – as big as a grapefruit," says Goldman, author of A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking (Doubleday, 1998). Aware that etrog juice is scant because the pulp is meager, she culls the tastiest part – its thick skin.

"Scrape away a bit of the zest, and you'll find a heady citrus bouquet, reminiscent of lemons and limes blended together in a tropical, citrusy perfume," she says. One whiff conjures up the Garden of Eden.

The etrog, which is the citron's Hebrew name, has played a part in Jewish history since ancient times. Originating in India, by 600 BCE the citron had travelled to Persia. Eventually it reached Babylonia, where it was adopted by exiled Jews who later carried it back to Palestine.

Because Jews were the only people in the Middle East to use etrogs in harvest festivals, the fruit evolved into a symbol of national identity, stamped on coins, monuments and gravestones. After the fall of the second Temple in 66 CE, when Jews were scattered throughout the Roman Empire, they planted etrogs wherever they would take root.

Although today production is small, etrog citrons are in heavy demand in Jewish communities at Sukkot. The main producers are Italy, Greece, Corsica, Morocco and Israel.

While local synagogues may arrange for members to obtain imported etrogs, they can sometimes be found at gourmet food stores, often labelled as citrons.

Passionate about baking with etrogs, Goldman believes in "eating a food of memory," one intertwined with Judaism for centuries. By doing so, she is teaching her sons to revere their history.

Should etrogs prove difficult to find, lemons yield excellent results in her recipes. The etrog or lemon-lime Sukkot cake is a moist confection with a fabulous fragrance. For a festive look, Goldman suggests garnishing the cake plate with citrus or myrtle leaves, as well as palm branches.

The lemon dairy cheesecake is a smooth and creamy yet zesty ending to dairy meals during Sukkot. The banana cake, she says in her book, "is one of those split-second-to-make cakes." A fine-grained, pareve cake, it derives its flavour from a tart lemon glaze.

If you always designate etrogs for centrepieces, Goldman offers two ways to preserve them after Sukkot: Make marmalade by substituting a couple etrogs for the Seville oranges usually called for in recipes. Shave etrog skin into tiny curlicues with a zester and freeze them for later baking projects.

"Whatever you do, don't waste them," says Goldman, who has a Web site (www.betterbaking.com) in which she answers recipe-related questions.

½ cup unsalted butter
1 cup sugar
2 tbsp. finely minced etrog zest, or lime zest, or a lemon/lime combination
2 eggs
¼ cup milk
½ tsp. vanilla extract
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. fresh lime juice
½ tsp. lime oil or extract
1½ cups all-purpose flour
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. baking soda
1½ tsp. baking powder

Preheat oven to 350. Generously grease an 8 x 4-inch loaf pan. In a mixing bowl cream the butter, sugar and zest together until well blended. Stir in eggs. Add the milk, vanilla, lemon and lime juices and lime oil and combine well.

Fold in the remaining dry ingredients to make a smooth batter. Spoon the batter into the prepared pan and bake until the cake is evenly browned and slightly cracked on top (30 to 35 minutes). Cool well before removing from pan.

Lemon-Lime Glaze
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. fresh lime juice
¼ cup sugar

In a small saucepan, heat the juices. Stir in the sugar until dissolved. Cool well. Using a cake tester, poke holes all over the cake and drizzle the glaze on top. Yield: 8-10 servings.

LEMON DAIRY CHEESECAKE

Bottom Crust
1¼ cups vanilla wafer or graham cracker crumbs
¼ cup unsalted butter, melted
1 tbsp. brown sugar
¼ tsp. ground cinnamon

In a medium bowl, mix ingredients together with a fork until evenly moistened. Press them into the bottom of a greased 9-inch springform pan.

Cheesecake Filling
1 lb. pot cheese
8 oz. cream cheese, softened
1 cup sugar
¼ cup all-purpose flour
½ cup plain yogurt or sour cream
4 eggs, plus 1 yolk
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tbsp. finely minced etrog or lemon zest

Preheat oven to 425. In a large mixing bowl, cream the cheeses until smooth. Then add sugar and flour. Blend in the yogurt. Add the eggs, yolk, lemon juice and zest, combining until smooth and thoroughly incorporated. Pour the batter into the prepared pan and bake for 15 minutes. Reduce heat to 225 and bake for another 40 minutes. The cake will be set in the middle and slightly golden in color. Cool well. Cover the top of the cake with plastic wrap and chill it overnight. Yield: 10 servings.

Coast to Coast

Jewish high school numbers down

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A hard look is being taken by Jewish community and educational leaders at why so many students are dropping out of the day school system after elementary school.

Many of these students are leaving for other private schools and questions are being asked as to whether Jewish high schools can be competitive with other private schools.

The Forum on Jewish High Schools is composed of representatives of FEDERATION CJA, the Bronfman Jewish Education Council, the Association of Jewish Day Schools, Bialik High School, the two Herzliah high schools, École Maimonide and their elementary schools. McGill University principal Bernard Shapiro is acting as a consultant.

"Everything is on the table," said forum chair Robert Zittrer, including the possibility of reducing the amount of Hebrew taught, if that is found to be a major factor.

"Do we have to teach Judaic studies in Hebrew only? I suspect some families want to stay in the Jewish system, they like the Jewish environment, but they wouldn't mind if nine hours a week of Hebrew was taught instead of 12 or 13, and the extra time went to arts or science.

"Perhaps Jewish history or ethics could be taught in English or French, or students might be given the option of taking more or less Hebrew. I think these would be positive moves."

Another possibility to be looked at, which is bound to be controversial, is school mergers or, at least, "strategic alliances," as schools try to stretch limited resources.

The forum is to make recommendations to the federation on how to attract more students to the Jewish high schools.

Zittrer said April is the target date for release of its report, but it may be later. "We have to be creative and far-reaching in finding solutions.

"If we can present to parents a product that will make the decision to leave the Jewish system tougher, we will have succeeded."

Today, about 7,000 students are enrolled in all Jewish schools.

It is estimated that 65 to 70 percent of Jewish children attend a Jewish elementary school, while only 40 to 45 percent go to a Jewish high school. Francophone schools have a higher retention record, Zittrer said.

Anecdotally, it seems most who leave the Jewish system go on to tony private schools like Selwyn House, Lower Canada College and St. George's School, he said.

"Parents perceive these schools as providing a higher quality education, having better resources and more attractive physical plants. They offer more optional courses and sports or other extracurricular activities."

Certainly, it is not cost that is keeping students away from the Jewish system, he said. The private schools' fees average in the $8 to 10,000 range a year, while fees at the three schools participating in the forum range from about $3,800 to $4,600, he said.

The first task will be to get the facts. Zittrer said it is seeking co-operation from the education ministry in tracking exactly where those who leave Jewish elementary schools go. It could be more are going into public schools than is thought, he said.

One reason offered by community leaders for the dropout level is the community policy that every Jewish child should have a Jewish education, regardless of ability to pay or learn.

However, Zittrer said, "there are many kids in the system now who can't cope with the three or four languages taught, or the longer days. Our schools are generally not geared to handle these kinds of problems."

Another reason may be that the Jewish high schools are not marketing themselves aggressively enough, while other private schools and some public schools recruit students actively, he said. "We have to recognize that the competition has raised the bar."

Zittrer could not say if the dropout rate has increased over the years, but enrolment is starting to level off at the mainstream high schools and there is concern that it could get worse.

"We are not a growing community," he said.

If Solomon Schechter Academy receives permission from the government to open a high school in 2001, as it hopes, "the impact would be obvious," Zittrer said. Solomon Schechter, the largest Jewish elementary school, is a major "feeder" for the Jewish high schools.

"If the answer is spending more money, the question is how will the extra cost be borne – by parents, the community, government?" Zittrer asked.

Another area the forum is examining is labour relations. The relationship between unions, administrators and lay board members could be more harmonious, he said.

Teachers have complained not only about pay, but lack of in-service training and the low esteem in which they feel they are held as professionals. Teachers, however, are not directly represented on the forum.

Zittrer acknowledges that the federation can have only so much influence on the Jewish schools. "Each is an autonomous corporation; there is no Jewish school board."

However, the federation allocates $2.3 million annually to subsidize tuition fees and assists the schools indirectly by providing social services and sponsoring classes d'accueil, for example. About 3,000 of the 7,000 students in the system over all receive some level of tuition assistance, he said.

Montreal's Vaad sets tougher kashruth rules

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Vaad Ha'ir, the main kashrut supervisory agency in Montreal, has for the first time published written rules that must be followed in order to have the Vaad's MK stamp of approval.

The rules apply to all caterers, rental companies, restaurants, hotels, synagogues, community organizations and even people entertaining in their own homes. Some of the rules are new and point to significantly more stringent control and inspection.

Vaad executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel said the impetus behind issuing The Vaad's Manual 2000-2001 was to establish standards that are applied equally at every phase of food handling, thereby protecting the consumer.

"I believe we are one of the first kashrut organizations in the world to put our policies in writing," said Rabbi Emanuel, who, before coming to Montreal two years ago, headed the Union of Orthodox Synagogues' kashrut division in Johannesburg, South Africa for 10 years.

Within the next few months, all will be paid directly by the Vaad, rather than by the businesses where they supervise kashrut. Until now, all mashgichim were authorized by the Vaad, but not necessarily employed by it.

At this point, the Vaad pays 70 to 80 mashgichim, and expects to employ about 100 by the end of the year, said Rabbi Emanuel. This is imperative, he said, if their first responsibility is to uphold Vaad policy.

The manual makes clear the caterer must defer to the mashgiach on any kashrut question. All rental companies must now also have a full-time mashgiach.

A major change outlined in the manual is the requirement that all caterers and all synagogues, certified by the Vaad, submit a form by the 7th of each month detailing events where food will be served for the next 30 days. This is intended to ensure that the Vaad has enough time to assign a mashgiach.

The 22 MK-certified caterers can only accept functions at the approved synagogues and hotels/reception halls listed in the manual. A few establishments that do not have full-time kosher kitchens have been included, but Rabbi Emanuel said no new places like that will be added.

Similarly, listed shuls may only use Vaad-approved caterers.

Catering at all other venues, including private homes, will require a case-by-case evaluation by the Vaad and will not necessarily be approved. The fact that kosher events have been held in the past does not give non-kosher venues any extra advantage in getting approved.

"There are no acquired rights," he said.

New in the case of venues not on the list, which includes kosher private homes, is the prohibition of kashering of appliances and other equipment for that event. Caterers will have to bring all equipment they need for food preparation. Counters and sinks, however, may be kashered, Rabbi Emanuel said.

"A home may, in fact, be kosher, but how can we assure the consumer of this?"

A mashgiach must be on site the entire time at functions in private homes whenever an MK-certified caterer's staff is working. This is not required when presealed take-out food is served and no catering staff sets up at the home.

Synagogues not on the list, such as Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom and the Reconstructionist Synagogue, will not be able to hire an MK-certified caterer under any circumstances, Rabbi Emanuel said.

Preparations for functions that take place on Saturday night can only begin one hour after Shabbat. No deliveries, preparation or setup may take place on Shabbat, even if staff are non-Jewish.

All food and rentals for a Shabbat affair must be totally cooked and delivered no later than noon the preceding Friday between Sukkot and Passover, and 2 p.m. the rest of the year. No food may be cooked in the shul for another or outside function. (This may affect, for example, Meals on Wheels programs.)

Another feature is the requirement that at every function, in addition to the traditional small card on the tables, a poster be displayed stating it is Vaad-supervised, giving the date, place and mashgiach's name.

At the approved hotels and synagogues, kosher equipment and supplies have to be locked and accessible only to the mashgiach.

The shipping of supplies to the site is also coming under greater control. All items must be sealed, stamped, dated and signed by the mashgiach, as do any returned items.

Some previously familiar fruits and vegetables are going to disappear from Vaad-supervised functions due to the difficulty in checking them for infestation. These include artichoke hearts, whole asparagus, blackberries, broccoli florets, fresh dill, all lettuce except iceberg and Boston, fresh parsley, raspberries, and fresh spinach.

In addition, canned vegetables must now have a recognized hechsher, whereas in the past this was not the case.

Kosher restaurants are being instructed that if a baby needs a milk bottle, the feeding must take place in a designated area. Employees are not permitted to bring any private food into the restaurant.

Rabbi Emanuel acknowledges that the more rigorous enforcement will put greater demand on the time of the mashgichim and there may be busy times of the year when it will be difficult to serve everyone.

There is a general shortage of mashgichim and the Vaad is doing its best to recruit more, or train new ones, he said. Rabbi Emanuel anticipates that the Vaad's overall staff will double in the near future.

Aspers close to finalizing deal for media empire

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Leonard Asper expects that his family's purchase of Conrad Black's newspaper empire should be finalized by the end of October.

"It's all quite routine," says Asper, Canwest Global's president and CEO, about the largest media deal in Canadian history, which was made public on July 31.

"There are i's to dot, t's to cross and third parties that have to give their consent. It takes time."

Canwest Global, the company started by Leonard's father Izzy, agreed to pay $3.5 billion to acquire most of the publishing and Internet assets of Conrad Black's Hollinger Inc.

That includes major newspapers in almost every major city in Canada, 129 smaller newspapers – the Thompson-owned Winnipeg Free Press being the notable exception – 85 trade magazines and four of the largest Canadian Internet portals. The Aspers also gain a 50 percent interest in the National Post.

Leonard Asper describes the deal as the ultimate convergence deal, making Canwest the leader in Canada, by far, in media content ownership and in the advertising market.

Izzy Asper began building his company in the mid-1970s after a stint as leader of the Manitoba Liberal party, when he and a partner bought a television station in North Dakota and moved it to Winnipeg.

The company is now the second-largest private broadcaster in Canada after CTV, and also has stations in Australia, New Zealand and Ireland.

IzzyAsper has contributed large sums of money to such projects as the Asper Jewish Community Campus and the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship at the University of Manitoba.

He and his family – his children are all in the family business – lend their names and support to many non-profit organizations in the community.

Leonard Asper notes that the family does not intend to tamper with the editorial direction of their newly acquired newspapers.

"They are not going to become our mouthpieces. The editorial policies will be decided on the ground, and determined by the issues that arise in the communities being served."

Hollinger and Conrad Black will continue to run the National Post for the next five years.

If other newspapers, such as the Winnipeg Free Press, should become available, Asper does not rule out adding them to Canwest Global's new newspaper arm, he says.

Survivors gather for prayers

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Herman Landau, 92, davens every day with others who, like him, are Holocaust survivors.

The president of Agudath Israel, an Orthodox shul on McGillivray Avenue, said most of the people who attend the synagogue are survivors.

During the war, Landau, who has been synagogue president for 30 years, was in a position to rescue some of those fleeing the Nazis.

Unfortunately, he recalled, some of his missions failed, and he still remembers with bitterness that he was unable to help two families separated from their lost children.

At age 35, Landau arrived in Switzerland with his family, after they had faced a number of dangers escaping from Germany.

He then became director of the Vaad Hatzalah of Agudath Israel in Switzerland, under aegis of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of America and Canada.

The group also sent funds to Shanghai, where 30,000 Polish Jews, including 1,000 yeshiva students, escaped.

"The Jews were treated well in Shanghai, but when the Japanese took the city over, things changed dramatically. We heard that the Japanese planned to put all the Jews on ships, send them out to sea, and then sink them," he said. "Fortunately, the Nazis were losing the war, and a decision was made to abandon the plan. Most of the Jews went to Israel and America."

Landau was also involved with negotiations which led to 1,200 Jews from the Theresienstadt camp being sent to Spain, where they were taken to safety. Another group was ready to go when Hitler had the train stopped in February 1945.

The negotiations had involved Gestapo head Heinrich Himmler and the president of Switzerland, and were so secret, Landau said, that the meeting places often had to be changed at the last moment.

The Vaad Hatzalah also played a role in money sent to aid Jews in Hungary and to a British group helping refugees in Europe. Often this money was carried by go-betweens, some of them rabbis, Landau said.

Everyone wishing to pray for physical, emotional or spiritual healing is invited to join in

THE TORONTO JEWISH HEALING PROJECT

The purpose of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project is to publicize and promote programmes, activities, and resources from a Jewish perspective for those seeking spiritual, physical and emotional healing.

The Toronto Jewish Community has recognized that Judaism has an enormous amount to say about illness and healing through the study of sacred texts, rabbinic commentary, midrash, music, ritual and stories

"Al Tifrosh Min Hatzibur-
Do not separate yourself from the community."
is never more important than at a time of illness.

Jewish tradition recognizes that, though there is never less to healing than what medical science is capable of, there is more to "healing" than what medicine offers.

The Toronto Jewish Healing Project is not affiliated with any stream of Judaism. It focuses on addressing human needs through the lens that Judaism can offer.

Que. human rights agenda still needs work: experts

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec has made measurable progress on the human rights front since the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms was adopted 25 years ago, but the province's underprivileged have yet to really benefit from it, said the president of the Quebec Human Rights Commission (QHRC).

"If you have no food on the table, human rights mean nothing," Claude Filion said at a workshop during the recent Plenary 2000 of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q).

Joining Filion on the panel, moderated by Dr. Victor Goldbloom, until last year Canada's Commissioner of Official Languages, were John Hucker, secretary-general of the Canadian Human Rights Commission; and Warren Allmand, president of the International Centre for Human Rights and Development.

Filion said the challenge for the future will include ensuring that all segments of society – including the poor – are embraced by the Quebec Charter.

He said the essence of the Quebec Charter, with its philosophical underpinnings found in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, lies in the concept of the "equality of all human beings" and the ideal of being able to "live together."

It should not be a matter of choosing to put food on the table or enjoying one's human rights, he said, since people need both, "rice and rights."

The uniqueness of the Quebec Charter, he said, is that it applies not only in regards to relations between citizens themselves, but between them and the state and private organizations.

Filion's commission makes about 1,000 inquiries annually, with many of its investigations related to issues of "economic and social rights," a primary aspect to the Quebec Charter. He said about one-third of its inquiries involve "public service bodies."

The commission's work includes public education and holding inquiries on issues ranging from race, religious beliefs and age, to sexual orientation, political beliefs and even pregnancy.

Hucker, who works for what he describes as a "complaints-taking agency," noted that when Quebecers think of a "rights charter," it's the Quebec one that springs to mind first, and not the Canadian charter.

He said that compared to 15 years ago, the Canadian commission has seen the issues change "subtly". Fewer cases involve "racism and sexism," he said.

Yet the concept of what constitutes "discrimination" has expanded to include older employees who are let go because they can't adapt to the latest technology, or the disabled who are not provided with adaptive systems at work, he said.

STUDENTS RALLY FOR PEACE: Jewish students at the University of Western Ontario gathered last Thursday to show their support for Israel. About 100 students said prayers for missing soldiers, for the State of Israel and for those who have died in the recent violence in Israel. The prayer vigil concluded with the singing of Hatikvah.

הוא הגדולים לא ירחם עוד,
ישאירם לבדם

לפעמים יצטרכו לחזול על ארבע
בחול הלוהט לתוחלת האיסוף,
וחם שותתי דם.

הארץ בוערת

"ONE DAY IN SEPTEMBER" is an instant classic. It is the crowning achievement of Arthur Cohn's astounding career. I think that the great secret of the film is that Arthur and his colleagues have trusted in the power of understatement. It is, in its way, a very quiet film, and it makes a hell of a lot of noise by being so."

UJA FEDERATION

No money gift changes more lives

the Campaigner

Canvassers Carry Campaign to $28 Million

Over 800 UJA FEDERATION canvassers have helped bring The Campaign For Our Children to more than 60% of its $45 million goal. The $28 million total to date represents nearly $3 million in increased gifts.

The Campaign For Our Children will allocate all additional dollars to helping children at risk, such as those in poverty or exposed to abuse, and bringing young people closer to Jewish life.

According to Jeff Baker, a four-year Real Estate Cabinet campaigner, surpassing the halfway point is deeply gratifying. "It would be great if even more people volunteered, because it's very important to help the community. The feeling you get is worth it. It's a sense of belonging."

Leslie Erlich

For John Colombo, an accountant with much campaign experience, reaching the $28 million milestone is rewarding. "I was able to get a 21% increase from the donors I called," he exclaimed proudly. "It's always a feeling of satisfaction when you're doing community work. I've always been willing to help. I've talked to many canvassers over the many years, and UJA FEDERATION is the premier charity we all work on."

Leslie Erlich, Co-Chair of the Young Leadership Cabinet's fundraising committee, reports positive response from the donors she's called. "Many are new donors, and it makes me feel good that we're building relationships with new people. As a member of the Jewish community in Toronto, volunteering is my obligation because I'm so fortunate to help other people in need."

There's still time to make a difference by joining UJA FEDERATION's upcoming telethons to help The Campaign For Our Children reach its final goal. The next Calling For Kids Telethons take place October 29 - November 2. To volunteer for a shift, please call Clare Adam at 416-635-2883 ext. 184.

Campaign Close-Up

Fran Grundman and Harvey Cooperberg co-chaired UJA FEDERATION Israel Funwalk 2000 and had no problem working closely, day after day for months on end. They happen to be cousins and, for them, community service really is all in the family. Now they're both strongly attached to The Campaign For Our Children.

Israel Funwalk 2000 Chairs Dr. Harvey Cooperberg and Fran Grundman.

Harvey's wife Maura, who had chaired the Walk a few years before, was the spark behind his involvement with UJA FEDERATION. "Maura had been very active," Harvey said. "But she enjoyed the Walk most of all because it runs the gamut of people, young and old. It's hands-on and a whole lot of fun. When Maura stepped down, I was very excited to take it on with Fran."

Fran can't remember a time when she wasn't involved in community. "I grew up with the example of my parents and never knew a life that didn't involve volunteering and leadership," she said. "It spills over into everything I do. No matter how busy a person gets, I believe you have to make time to participate in building a strong and healthy community."

"The Cooperberg family feels strongly about tzedakah," Harvey added. "I see it like this. If I needed help, the Jewish community would be there for me, so it makes sense for me to be there for it."

Fran and Harvey have passed on the leadership torch for the Funwalk to Alec Gowinsky and Elyza Litwin after two years as Co-Chairs but, according to Fran, "We're by no means walking away. It was definitely a labour of love and I'll continue to help the campaign surpass its goal."

Not surprisingly, she'll be joined by her cousin and friend, Harvey. He continues to be active as a campaign canvasser. Harvey has a special philosophy about giving. "We work all year for ourselves, for our family," he explained. "I suggest to people that they work one day a year for UJA FEDERATION."

ETGAR Challenges Teachers

UJA FEDERATION campaign dollars are nurturing the creative excellence of Jewish Toronto's 1500 education professionals through innovative Board of Jewish Education (BJE) projects such as ETGAR. It's a challenging incentive program that provides support for teachers who come up with new Jewish curriculum ideas.

Some ETGAR programs include: an ecology-themed art and music activity CD, based on Jewish sources and traditions; a curriculum about Sephardic Jewry, for grades 3 - 6; a middle-school (grade 7-8) Canadian Jewish history curriculum; and Firsts for Women, a Day School/Supplementary School collaboration for grades 3 - 6, highlighting strong women in text.

"ETGAR grew out of a desire to help teachers reach their fullest professional potential," said BJE Executive Director Dr. Seymour Epstein, who pointed out that ETGAR funding recipients also receive assistance from Jewish education experts at York University and the University of Toronto.

Jewish Life is a work of art

Leo Baeck Day School students joined together to raise $3600 on behalf of UJA FEDERATION's initiative for Ethiopian Jews in Kiryat Moshe. In addition to their school-wide fundraising efforts, the students created a beautiful hand-crafted wall hanging.

The artwork, which depicts Jewish life in Toronto, will be hung in Kiryat Moshe's Community Centre.

Local lessons from Mideast conflict

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

This has not been an easy couple of weeks for our friends in the Jewish community. In addition to their concern for Israel, they have to deal with the Canadian fallout of the ongoing violence. Hopefully, by the time you read this, a calm of sorts will have descended on the Middle East. But the concerns of Canadian Jewry will not quietly fade away. So once again, herewith, please accept some unsolicited advice that may help you navigate the next little while.

Government Relations: Lloyd Axworthy has proven himself to be as unreliable a friend to Israel and Canadian Jews as Arafat has proven himself to be an unreliable negotiating partner. There is little value in regarding Axworthy as an address for your grievances. Never one to bother with details, poor Jean Chrétien had no idea of the significance of the affirmative UN Security Council vote cast by Canada on the instruction of his foreign minister. Rumour has it the prime minister has heard an earful of explanations from Liberal supporters who vote with their money.

The community should press for accountability from the prime minister. Expect him to meet soon with community leaders who will demand – as any legitimate constituency has the right to do – the kind of adjustments to Canadian policy that would move Canada towards a balanced approach to the conflict in the Middle East.

In the same vein, the community should direct some praise to Stockwell Day and Monte Solberg of the Canadian Alliance. They did what the government would not do – call for an end to violence without singling anyone out for special consideration.

Jewish-Arab Relations: One of the casualties suffered over the last couple of weeks is relations between the two groups. Any warmth or mutual respect went up in smoke as Arabs and Palestinians rallied in many cities calling for "Death to the Jews." There is an opportunity here to score some points with Canadians at large and promote a more constructive perspective on the Middle East issues that keep on imposing themselves on Canadian soil.

Diaspora-Israel Relations: If the past is any indication, Israel will eventually shift things over to the negotiating table with the Palestinian leadership. Regardless of how Canadian Jews feel at the moment, they must keep the rhetoric in check if they want to avoid the potential for a gap between their position and that of the Israeli government.

Halifax breast cancer run raises $10,000 a week later

BY JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — It may have taken place a week later due to Rosh HaShanah, but the Halifax Jewish community's Run for the Cure had the same enthusiasm and fund-raising response as the main run did a week earlier.

Nearly $10,000 was raised by the 70 women, men, teens and children who participated in the Oct. 8 event, which was sponsored by the Atlantic Jewish Council. That figure was in addition to the almost $1.4 million raised throughout Atlantic Canada on Oct. 1.

"I'm absolutely delighted," said event convener Kathy Zilbert, at a breakfast at Beth Israel Synagogue following the 3-kilometre run/walk. "We had no idea what [participant] numbers would be, maybe 40 or 45 because of Erev Yom Kippur, but almost 70 – wow!"

Breakfast guest speaker Carol Ann Cole said 53 Canadians are diagnosed with breast cancer every day "and 15 Canadians die from it every day.

"You have to take responsibility for yourself. When the doctor says 'probably' nothing wrong, that still means 'possible.' Keep checking and following up."

Cole, a Nova Scotian breast cancer survivor whose mother died of the illness, developed the Comfort Heart, a pewter heart-shaped necklace that patients can rub for comfort while thinking positive thoughts.

She saw the tiny figure as a means to raise funds for cancer research. Of each $10 heart sold, $6 goes to the fund.

"I hoped to raised $500,000 from this," said Cole, who held a vice-presidency with Bell Canada when she was diagnosed in 1992. She gave up her job, went into fund-raising full time and has, to date, raised almost $1.1 million through sales of the heart.

Zilbert said the AJC run was designed for families. "It wasn't tough to sell. Most families have a personal connection with a breast cancer story. That certainly makes them want to be involved," she said.

Crisis in Israel

'Whether the world likes it or not, Israel will defend itself'

Likud leader Ariel Sharon, who made a much-publicized visit to the Temple Mount Sept. 28, "had every right to do so, as does any Israeli," said Landy. "Mr. Sharon did nothing but visit a holy site and it is totally outrageous for his visit to be considered by anyone to be a valid excuse for igniting violence."

Arafat "bears enormous responsibility" for the violence, and used Sharon's Temple Mount visit "as a pretext to turn the flames on full burner.

"Whether the world likes it or not, Israel will defend itself and Israeli soldiers will take measures which are necessary when their lives are threatened," Landy said to loud applause.

Landy also noted that CJC national president Moshe Ronen telephoned Day to thank the Opposition leader for criticizing Canada's UN vote.

Last week, three backbench Liberal MPs with large Jewish constituencies split with their government on the vote. Joe Volpe, who attended the Toronto rally, Irwin Cotler and Carolyn Bennett criticized their party for endorsing the resolution.

Emboldened by the UN vote and sympathy from the media, there is a feeling among Palestinians that "they have Israel on the run. Nothing could be further from the truth," Landy stated.

Rochelle Wilner, chair of B'nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs, called for Jewish unity in the wake of the violence.

She also decried what she called the inculcation of young Palestinian children with hatred of Jews, and the promotion of violent anti-Semitism in Palestinian media.

Wilner recalled being present at a Palestinian demonstration earlier this month in front of the Israeli consulate. "I was horrified at the overt expressions of hate directed at us. When hate is palpable on the sidewalks of Toronto, let alone on the sidewalks of Jerusalem, how can a process to create peace proceed?"

Alan Sandler, president of UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, called for calm. "Our wisdom and strength lie in our mitzvot," he said.

Israel's consul general in Toronto, Meir Romem, was greeted with a standing ovation. "The best response to our enemies, the best expression of our love for Israel, is to fill El Al planes and fill the hotels and go to Israel," he urged. "I know you will join me in telling the world that Israel is strong, firm and will be there forever," Romem said to powerful cheers.

Shoel Silver of the Canada-Israel Committee said the CIC is seeking an "urgent" meeting with federal officials for an explanation of Canada's position.

Earlier, the CIC called the UN motion "an overtly biased and discriminatory resolution, which in criticizing Israel alone, fails to reflect the complexity of the situation on the ground.

"We are telling the government," Silver said, "'You have betrayed Israel. You have betrayed the truth. You have betrayed us.'"

***

Chrétien was responding to Day, who accused the prime minister of taking sides by backing a UN resolution "clearly slanted with an anti-Israel bias."

Chrétien denied that.

"We voted for a resolution for peace," he said, adding he had written to Israeli and Palestinian leaders "asking them to ask their supporters to show moderation and bring back some peace.

"Before, we had made some statements about provocation but we're not taking sides. We want everybody to stop fighting and go back to the negotiation table. It's what we're urging them to do.

"It's not anti-Israel," Chrétien said.

"Mr. Day made a statement. He wants you to notice him a bit."

Both Day and his foreign affairs critic Monte Solberg said Ottawa made a mistake by choosing sides.

"I am not sure we will further the cause of peace if we as a nation join in the finger pointing, rather than working with both sides co-operatively," Day said in a statement.

"The Canadian government has made a grave error in supporting this unjust resolution," added Solberg.

Last Thursday, Chrétien issued a statement on the escalating tensions between Israeli forces and Palestinians in the town of Ramallah, where two Israeli reservists were beaten to death by a Palestinian mob.

"Canadians are deeply concerned by the escalating tension and mounting loss of life in the region and call on both parties to exercise strong and decisive leadership to put a stop to hostilities.

"I urge both Israelis and Palestinians to act with the utmost restraint to end the current cycle of violence and allow authorities to return to the negotiating table as soon as possible.

"I call on them not to let the events of the past few weeks undo all the progress they have made toward a just and lasting peace – the peace for which both Israelis and Palestinians – indeed the entire world – hope and pray.

"Canada welcomes the continued efforts of UN Secretary General Koffi Annan, the United States and Egypt to reinvigorate the peace process. And we are ready to use our good relations with the parties to advance this vital process in any way we can."

Crisis in Israel

Israel's woes felt at federation meeting

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — FEDERATION CJA president Marilyn Blumer ushered in her second year as president with high praise for the achievements accomplished since the Jewish community campus was opened almost a year ago.

Yet the usually festive mood at the federation's 83rd annual meeting was, to some extent, overshadowed by the recent violent turmoil in the Middle East.

As the meeting drew to a close, Irwin Cotler, Mount Royal riding Liberal MP, got up to the podium and strongly denounced Canada's vote in the United Nations – supported by his own government – that termed Israel's use of force excessive.

Cotler said his office was flooded by telephone calls, e-mails and faxes from members of the Jewish community, outraged that Canada supported the UN Security Council resolution.

"I conveyed to the prime minister today that the resolution was one-sided and misinformed," he told the invited audience of hundreds.

"In substance and in tone it blamed Israel," but it made no reference to the Palestinians' destruction of religious sites such as Joseph's Tomb or to the Palestinian Authority's sanctioned violence against Israel, he said.

Israel's consul general in Montreal, Shlomo Avital, told the crowd as the meeting got underway, that the Palestinians violence has been "orchestrated, premeditated and anti-Semitic."

Although one must reserve some hope that the peace process will remain alive, the Israel Defence Forces will do what it must to quash the riots, Avital said.

"It's too early for a post-mortem on the peace process, but if Israelis are fired upon we will take all necessary measures to protect our citizens," he said.

In her remarks, Blumer said that the Jewish community would stand "steadfastly by Israel", and keynote speaker Bernard Shapiro, McGill University's principal, said the Jewish community must demonstrate its solidarity with Israel. He added, however, that it does not mean that the community necessarily has to support everything the government does.

"At a time like this, we must not only stand with Israel, we cannot stand aside from it," he said.

The crowd was also urged to attend a community solidarity rally scheduled for the next evening.

In her remarks, Blumer highlighted federation accomplishments during the past year.

They included the launch of the campus, the merger of seniors' services into the mega Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors, and a forum launched recently to examine ways to keep students in the Jewish high school system.

Other initiatives include providing services to children with special needs, the activities of Pro-Montreal and its Entrepreneurs fund, the federation's support of new efforts to upkeep the dilapidated Back River Cemetery, Birthright Israel, and planned completion of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre's expansion.

All this and more, Blumer said, point to the Jewish community campus being "the one place for Jewish community life.

"We've gone from the position of building [the campus] to rebuilding the community's vision," she said.

A highlight of the meeting was the bestowment of the Samuel Bronfman Medal, the community's highest honour, to Sheila Kussner, best known for founding the internationally renowned cancer-support group, Hope and Cope, at the Jewish General Hospital in 1981.

Kussner, who had bone cancer when she was 14 years old, said she accepted her award with joy and humility, adding that she learned the nuts and bolts of fund-raising through her work with the Combined Jewish Appeal.

Having had cancer, she said, gave her a "heightened sense of compassion and empathy for others" and made her choose throughout her life to be "better rather than bitter.

"In choosing to be better, each and every one of us can have a profound impact on community," she said.

The meeting also included the presentation of several other community awards, including to Joseph Gabay and Goldie Hershon (for Distinguished Leadership); Elaine Mintz (Women's Federation's new Minnie Cummings Abbey Award); Sandie Sparkman (Yad Leadership); Gail Adelson Marcovitz and Mark Potechin (Young Leadership); Matthew Poplaw (Jonathan Roskies Award for New Leadership); Arié Lévy (Gertrude & Henry Plotnick Student Leadership Award); Lois Lieff and Susan Szalpeter (Award for Professional Excellence); and the Volunteer Department of the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors (Community Service Award).

As well, CJA 2000 chair Stephen Reitman said this year's campaign, which ends Nov. 15, had to date raised $25.5 million of its $38 million goal.

Shapiro, who became active at federation about a year ago, spoke of the importance of community service, and challenged each audience members to recruit a new community volunteer over the coming year.

"Hopefully, one younger than each of us," he said.

The Mystery of the Samaritans

The Samaritans use a script resembling ancient Hebrew and have a Torah, which with various exceptions is otherwise virtually identical to ours. Like the Ethiopian Jews, they practise a pre-rabbinic Judaism. According to Josephus, the Samaritans were founded by a Jewish group that split from the priesthood and settled in Samaria. That the Christian Bible singles out the "good Samaritan" shows that they were discriminated against in Temple times.

Prayer for peace offered at rally in Calgary

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — "May we see the day when war and bloodshed cease, when a great peace will embrace the whole world."

So began the prayer for peace offered by Rabbi Jamie Korngold of Temple B'nai Tikvah at a solidarity rally for Israel held last Wednesday at the Calgary Jewish Centre.

About 400 people attended the rally to demonstrate support for Israel and for the pursuit of peace in the Middle East.

Speakers expressed the emotions shared by many in the room: sadness at the loss of life in rioting, frustration that hopes for peace have been derailed and that violence has replaced diplomacy, anger at biased reporting on the clashes, and disappointment that Canada supported the anti-Israel resolution passed at the United Nations Oct. 7.

"We gather to share our emotions and to offer our hopes and prayers for a just and lasting peace and for the safe return of the Israeli hostages [kidnapped by Hezbollah]," said David Prasow, president of Calgary Jewish Community Council. "We gather to show solidarity and support for Israel during these troubling and dangerous times."

Amir Maimon, counsellor at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa, made a special trip to Calgary to address the gathering.

Maimon countered widespread media claims that it was the visit of Likud leader Ariel Sharon to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem just before Rosh Hashanah that provoked the latest violence.

"The violence started before Sharon visited," Maimon said, pointing out that two Israeli police officers had been murdered the day before, one in the West Bank town of Kalkilya, the other in Netzarim in the Gaza Strip.

The allegation that it was Sharon who triggered the rioting "is just an excuse used by the Palestinian Authority," Maimon said.

The Israeli army, he stated, is not acting, but is reacting to events as they unfold.

"We didn't invite the outbreak of violence; we were forced to respond."

Maimon rued the lack of support being shown Israel on the international stage.

"We are not supported by Canada, our traditional friend. We need your help and support to change public opinion and to influence decision makers, to make sure it won't be a one-sided story," he said.

That message was reinforced by both Lorne Paperny, who spoke on behalf of the Canada Israel Committee, and Aron Eichler, who represented B'nai Brith Canada. Both urged Calgarians to sign petitions in support of peace and reconciliation, to write letters to the editor presenting Israel's point of view, and to write to MPs, Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien protesting Canada's support of the UN resolution condemning Israel.

"We cannot allow the [Canadian] government to be manipulated by distortions of reality," Paperny said. "We must not let Canada isolate Israel."

"It is our collective responsibility to stand together as am echad (one people), to stand together for the safety of the State of Israel," Eichler said.

All rabbis in Calgary participated in the rally: Rabbi Jamie Korngold of Temple B'nai Tikvah, Rabbi Seth Binus of Congregation House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel, Rabbi Moshe Saks of the Beth Tzedec Synagogue and Rabbi Menachem Matusof of Chabad Lubavitch. All offered prayers for peace.

CIC chair criticizes government support of Israel

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Canadian Jews are urged to lobby Prime Minister Jean Chretien and local members of Parliament to let them know that they find their record of support for Israel to be unacccceptable, unbalanced, unfair and unwarranted, says the chair of the Canada Israel Committee.

Speaking at a solidarity with Israel rally attended by over 400 at Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Joe Wilder slammed the Liberal government for voting in favour of a UN resolution condemning Israel for "using excessive force" in the current conflict with the Palestinians.

"Although our Foreign Minister, Lloyd Axworthy, has been helpful from time to time, Canada's voting record at the UN in support of Israel has always been questionable," Wilder said.

"There have been worse resolutions that Canada has supported. Canada's Jewish community has the right to feel that our government is deserting us. We must not allow our government to get away with being fair weather friends."

Wilder described the last three weeks as gut-wrenching and expressed fear for the future of Israel. He noted that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak made "a quantum leap" for peace. He has offered more concessions than any previous Israeli leader. Yasser Arafat did not respond to the offer.

> 'Canada's voting record at the UN has always been questionable'

"By not accepting Barak's offer, Arafat lost the advantage. President Bill Clinton called him on it. He went looking for support around the world and didn't find any. While Israel's stock soared, Arafat was seen an a rejectionist. His response was to foment violence to regain world sympathy. Israel's legitimate rights do not seem to exist in the minds of the Palestinians. If Ariel Sharon had not visited the Temple Mount, they would have found another excuse."

Wilder noted how Arafat has manipulated world opinion in an insidious manner and succeeded with the blood of children. "Arafat has 40,000 armed police," Wilder said. "Why does he send children armed with stones to confront Israeli soldiers? These children have been raised to hate and believe that martyrdom is the highest ideal."

In noting the destruction of Joseph's Tomb in Nablus by an Arab mob,Wilder pointed out that Israel is the only country in the region that protects all holy places and allows people of all religious beliefs access to their holy sites.

Rev. John Howson, national director of Bridges For Peace, a Christian organization that helps settle Jewish immigrants in Israel, expressed Christian solidarity with Israel.

"We aren't going to fall for the Palestinian verbiage," he said. "We know that only Israel and the Jews will safeguard our freedom of access to our religious sites. It seems strange for the Palestinians to be demanding more liberties when Prime Minister Barak offered them east Jerusalem and sovereignity on the Temple Mount and they turned it down."

Winnipeg Jewish Federation president Howard Morry read a letter from Lloyd Axworthy expressing his "deepest sadness at the deteriorating situation in Israel" and praying for peace and conciliation.

"It seems that only yesterday, peace was close at hand," Morry said.

"That is now light years in the past. It ended with the rioting, the mutilation of the Israeli soldiers in Ramallah and the use of children in the front lines to win people's sympathies.

"We can't allow ourselves to be manipulated by the media. This is not the time to turn away from Israel. Rather, we should be turning to our [non-Jewish] neighbours and making the case for Israel. We should show that we are proud to be Jews."

Israeli businessman kidnapped

Barak denies victim a Mossad agent

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak acknowledged Sunday in an official statement that Hezbollah has kidnapped an Israeli citizen, Elhanan Tannenbaum. Barak condemned the act as "a Mafia-style operation that does not conform to the behavioural norms of the 21st century."

Responding to claims by Hezbollah Secretary General Sheik Hassan Nasrallah that Tannenbaum is a member of Israel's security forces, Barak said the man is not a state employee and "is not employed by any official body."

The prime minister said the kidnapped Israeli is simply an officer in the reserves, "like many other Israelis, and is not linked to security or intelligence organizations."

Israeli security sources also insisted last Sunday that Tannenbaum, who holds the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the reserves, is a businessman who has never worked on behalf of Israeli intelligence.

Sheik Nasrallah

The initial investigation into the kidnapping indicates that Iranian operatives or their associates are directly linked to the abduction. Israeli security sources mentioned Imad Maghniyah as a key suspect in organizing the kidnapping.

Maghniyah is considered a leading Hezbollah operative and is thought to be directly affiliated with the Iranian intelligence services. He is believed to be a special operations "contractor" for the Lebanese Shiite organization, and is suspected of being the architect behind the lethal bomb attack against the Israeli embassy in Argentina in 1992.

The initial information on Tannenbaum's disappearance reached Israel when Sheik Nasrallah announced Sunday morning on a Hezbollah television broadcast from Beirut that the organization was holding an Israeli Mossad agent with the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

The defence ministry was contacted by the abducted man's family, which said it suspected that Hezbollah had kidnapped Tannenbaum, a lieutenant-colonel in the reserves, with whom the family had lost contact 12 days earlier.

There are various theories regarding the reasons for Tannenbaum's disappearance. One version is that he left for Europe because of a family dispute; another is that he was travelling, perhaps to Switzerland, on business.

The purpose of Tannenbaum's trip remains unclear, although investigators believe he was on his way to meet people he knew.

One possibility investigators are considering is that his contacts detained Tannenbaum and transferred him, for a price, to Hezbollah operatives. Another hypothesis is that Tannenbaum was invited to participate in some sort of deal with people he did not know, and was then kidnapped.

Police and Shin Bet security service investigators visited the family at their home to gather information about Tannenbaum. The family was also asked not to discuss the case with the media or to volunteer information.

Hezbollah — Masters of surprise

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The recent kidnapping of Elhanan Tannenbaum, a reserve officer in the Israel Defence Forces, is believed to have been carried out by Hezbollah.

It appears that Tannenbaum was lured someplace by businessmen with whom he had ties, and then was abducted by Hezbollah operatives. It is fair to assume that he has not been taken to Lebanon and that he is either in the country where he was kidnapped or has been transferred to Iran.

Analysis

In kidnapping an Israeli citizen abroad, Hezbollah crossed a red line, knowing full well that for some time now, Israel has refrained from responding to the organization's actions, in order not to open a "second front" in Lebanon.

Hezbollah positions in the border area are right under the noses of IDF troops, yet their men drive around without fear, even after the recent kidnapping of three IDF soldiers near Har Dov.

The announcement by Hezbollah's secretary general that an Israeli officer had been kidnapped left people in Israel a little confused about who was being referred to – except for Tannenbaum's family, who contacted the Defence Ministry and reported that Tannenbaum had been missing for more than a week.

Hezbollah has been involved in kidnappings in the past, when the organization operated under different names. In the 1980s, it kidnapped Westerners in Lebanon, and from the start it had Iranian support. Hezbollah and its leadership were never punished for these acts, nor for the bombings of the U.S. Marine and French barracks in Beirut in 1982.

Tannenbaum's case is the first time Hezbollah has kidnapped a civilian outside the borders of Lebanon. Hezbollah excels in surprise operations, the majority of which have not been met with an Israeli response.

The organization, with the help of Iranian intelligence agents, bombed Israeli and Jewish targets in Buenos Aires in the early 1990s. Hezbollah also surprised Israel and the South Lebanon Army when it used unarmed civilians to head military columns. This move resulted in the rapid collapse of outposts in the security zone in southern Lebanon, since Israel did not fire at civilians.

The organization has been using the same tactic since Israel withdrew from southern Lebanon in May: daily busloads of civilians are brought to the border to throw stones and Molotov cocktails at Israeli soldiers and civilians. During one such demonstration two weeks ago, Hezbollah kidnapped three IDF soldiers.

So far, Israel has chosen not to respond with force to these acts. But the IDF believes that Hezbollah will not cease its operations after the recent kidnappings. Iran is backing the organization's actions and Damascus is also not free from blame. It has failed to condemn these actions, and perhaps even indirectly encouraged them.

Anti-Semitic violence on the rise in France

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Tension between Jews and Muslims has mounted in France since the violence in the Middle East began, as dozens of anti-Semitic attacks against synagogues, Jewish schools and other institutions have occurred this month.

Synagogues have been attacked and "death to the Jews" slogans shouted at pro-Arab rallies, police and Jewish leaders said last week.

Firebombs were thrown at two synagogues in Paris and one in Lyon, causing damage to the outside of the buildings but no harm to any people, the reports said.

One attack occurred during Yom Kippur services. At another synagogue, worshippers who were leaving were met with stone-throwing and cries of "death to Israel" from youths waiting nearby. Anti-Semitic graffiti was found in at least two places in the Paris suburbs.

All around the Paris area, police protection was stepped up for Yom Kippur. "This is obviously linked to events [in the Middle East]," a police spokesperson said of the attacks.

According to Moise Cohen, president of the Israelite Consistory of Paris, still more assaults took place at a synagogue and a Jewish school in the Paris region over the Yom Kippur weekend. Cohen accused French media of covering up the extent of anti-Semitic activity since the outburst of violence in the Middle East two weeks ago.

"Let me remind you that there was a protest [that] Saturday ... where there were cries of 'death to the Jews,'" he said, adding that several commentators said it was the first time the cry had been heard in Paris since the German occupation during World War II.

Several Jewish buildings were stoned

Several thousand people marched on Saturday, Oct. 7, in Paris, Strasbourg, Lyon and Marseille, to show support for the Palestinian cause. In addition to chanting "death to the Jews," some Paris protesters carried a banner showing the Star of David equalling the Nazi swastika. Leila Shahid, the Palestinian envoy to France, criticized those protesters during her speech to the rally.

One Jewish representative, Gilles Taieb, said several Jews had been assaulted and slightly injured by Arab youths in Paris that Saturday night.

Several Jewish buildings were stoned, broken into or daubed with graffiti over the weekend before Yom Kippur, a spokesperson for the Paris Jewish community said.

Leaders of France's Jewish community met with President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Lionel Jospin last week and called for calm after the anti-Jewish attacks.

Last weekend, Jospin announced that his government has taken steps to ensure the safety of Jewish institutions. He said the justice ministry has advised French prosecutors to deal severely with anyone suspected of taking part in attacks against Jewish institutions.

He also said police will act aggressively to prevent "all acts and all attempted acts that are racist in character or anti-Semitic."

Jospin's remarks came just hours after a bakery owned by an Alsatian Jew in the eastern city of Strasbourg was set on fire, with the words "Jewish Assassins" painted on the bread shop in black.

Two synagogues in suburban Paris were also targeted, local authorities said. Assailants tried to set one synagogue on fire by hurling Molotov cocktails at it. The devices failed to ignite the building, and there was no damage.

Three youths were taken in for questioning by police after allegedly throwing bottles containing flammable material at another synagogue.

In Biarritz, where European Union leaders were meeting on the weekend, Chirac condemned the anti-Jewish attacks, calling them "intolerable" and "unacceptable."

"Everyone in France must respect the values of fraternity, liberty and tolerance that are the very foundation of our republic," he said.

Meanwhile, Likud leader Ariel Sharon's office announced last week that he would not be visiting France this week, as scheduled, because of security concerns. Sharon had been invited by a Jewish organization to visit Paris on Tuesday, Oct. 17, to take part in an evening meeting to support Israel.

The week in Israel

Oct. 10

• UN Secretary General Kofi Annan vowed to discuss with Lebanese authorities the "situation" of the three IDF soldiers kidnapped over the weekend by Hezbollah gunmen. "The soldiers should not be harmed," Annan said. The soldiers are: Staff Sgt. Avraham Binyamin, Staff Sgt. Omar Suad and Sgt. Adi Avitan.

Oct. 11

• The IDF warned that the Palestinians were laying the groundwork for turning Joseph's Tomb into a mosque. The warning came after Palestinian workers began repairing the shrine after it was destroyed by rampaging Palestinians last week. The workers painted the domed roof green, the colour of Islam. The Nablus mayor claimed city officials simply wanted to return the building to the way it looked before the Six Day War.

Oct. 12

• A Palestinian mob murdered two IDF reservists in PA police custody. In a shocking display of barbarism, the mob mutilated the bodies of the soldiers and revelled in the blood of the two murdered men, Vadim Novefitch, 35, from Or Akivah, married only 5 days earlier and Yosef Avrahami, 38, from Petach Tikvah.

Oct. 13

• About 50 Palestinians torched the ancient Shalom Al Yisrael Synagogue in Jericho. The synagogue is clearly defined as a holy site in the Oslo agreements, and the Palestinian Authority was obliged to safeguard free passage to it for Israelis.

Recent events demonstrate the power of democracy

By AMNON RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

Anyone who heard and saw the recent statements made by masked and unmasked men – Israeli Arabs, including Knesset members – also heard what was being said between the lines: There is a reawakening of the new-old hope that Israel can be destroyed just as the Crusader kingdom was destroyed some 1,300 years ago, that there is no justification for any national body in this area that is not Muslim-Arab.

The statements talked about "erasing the Green Line," about a Palestine stretching from the sea to the desert, and about the end of the Jewish state (on the pretext of the blood libel that Israel intends to destroy the mosques on the Temple Mount).

It must be noted that such talk was heard even before any Arab citizens of Israel were killed. But this renewed hope, which many of us thought had died long ago, is apparently based in part on the following:

- the unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon, which seemed like evidence of Israeli weakness;
- the concessions that Prime Minister Ehud Barak was willing to make to Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat at Camp David, and afterward on the issue of Jerusalem as well, which were characterized in a false light as Israeli submission;
- the much publicized disagreements and "anti-Zionist" mood within Israel's divided society.

The truth is that Palestinian leaders and the minority extremists among the Israeli Arab community are making a great mistake, a mistake that could lead to tragic results for all peoples in the Middle East. (The majority of Palestinians, it must be said, rejects, albeit in its passive way, violence and Muslim-Arab racism.)

The mistake is double: It misinterprets both the nature of Israeli democracy and our willingness to make painful compromises.

It is the nature of democracy to appear weak from without, while being strong from within. Until quite recently, the United States seemed to be at a serious low point, and many people predicted the end of the "American era."

The United States was humiliated in Vietnam, painfully bearing the internal schism that the war created. It submissively accepted the brazen Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. It accepted the capture of hostages and the siege of its embassy in Tehran, and many people believed that it was beginning to slide down a slippery slope, with the Soviet Union standing above it. Suddenly, with no preparation of public opinion, the Soviet giant collapsed and the apparent American weakling became the sole superpower.

Many have erred in assessing the strength of democratic rule. Experience teaches that democracy is strong in several ways. First of all, a modern economy can flourish only under a regime of freedom and liberty.

Tyranny is the enemy of growth.

The Arab world is backward, not because it is not talented – Western universities and industry are filled with Arab experts – but because its regimes are tyrannical, corrupt and backward.

Israel is in a comfortable position on the Economist's list of emerging economies, and in 23rd place on the UN's development rating. No Arab nation comes anywhere close. Israel's domestic product is greater than that of all of its Arab neighbours.

Furthermore, by nature, democratic society is a compromising society because it must consider all of its components. But when faced with a dead-end, no-choice situation, it gathers together all of its forces in order to win the war.

Dictatorial society conceals a deep and wide bitterness that hurts its ability to achieve total commitment. The withdrawal from Lebanon and the far-reaching compromises that Prime Minister Ehud Barak is willing to make are the sign, not of weakness that heralds the end, but rather of informed strength that is prepared for coexistence based on mutual respect.

Israel today is stronger economically and militarily than it has ever been before. This strength stems above all from its democratic rule and freedom of expression.

If it wants, the Palestinian leadership can achieve peace with us and learn from our democratic experience. But this leadership will be making a great error if it cannot comprehend both our strength and the secret of that strength.

Israel & the Jewish World

Can Israel trust the UN again?

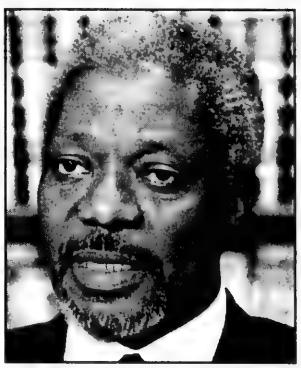
By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A UN Security Council resolution that blames Israel for the Middle East crisis reveals that the world body is still biased against the Jewish state, say Israeli diplomats and North American Jewish observers.

Moreover, they say, it reinforces concerns that the United Nations cannot be a trusted third party in the peace process. It also underscores why it should not be granted guardianship of the Temple Mount in Jerusalem – a suggestion floated by Israel prior to the recent outbreak of hostilities.

The UN resolution passed by a vote of 14-0. The United States abstained while Canada voted in favour.

The resolution noted the disproportionate number of Palestinian victims, without mentioning Jewish casualties; it condemned the excessive use of force against civilians; it omitted the apparent unwillingness of Palestinian leaders to rein in the rioters; and it mentioned the Temple Mount only by its Arabic name, Haram As-Sharif.



UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan

"The resolution is one-sided, unfair and doesn't portray the entire reality," said one Israeli diplomat. "Unfortunately, the Security Council proved that it probably will not be able to play the role of an unbiased, honest broker in any future negotiations."

Israel's long-troubled relations with the United Nations had improved of late, mostly because of Prime Minister Ehud Barak's efforts to achieve peace. After years of lobbying, the country had attained official – albeit partial and temporary – entry in May into the Western European and Others Group, one of five regional UN groupings.

Prior to its admission into the group, Israel was the only one of 189 UN member states shut out of the regional grouping system, and therefore ineligible to serve on the Security Council and prominent UN agencies. But the recent resolution indicated that little has changed, say some.

"The Security Council has reverted to being an arena of political warfare being used by Arabs against Israel," said Harris Schoenberg, chair of the UN caucus of Jewish non-governmental organizations, an umbrella for about 25 Jewish groups.

More condemnation seems to be in store for Israel.

The Geneva-based, 53-member Commission on Human Rights is scheduled to hold a special session this week to discuss the Middle East crisis. Special sessions are rare; the last was to discuss the crisis in East Timor.

"Considering the commission's track record, it's fair to assume that things will not go well for Israel," said Michael Colson, executive director of the Geneva-based UN Watch, noting that each year, the commission ritualistically passes five anti-Israel resolutions.

Schoenberg and other critics, though, singled out for praise UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan, who as of this writing, was trying to mediate the release of three Israeli soldiers kidnapped on the Israeli-Lebanese border by the Islamic militant group Hezbollah.

Jewish UN-watchers have often lamented the way in which Arab and Muslim member-states use their control over large blocs of votes to batter Israel.

To assure a large majority on votes or resolutions, they allegedly bully their allies, including the Europeans, with threats to cut off oil supplies or foreign trade and investment.

That's why, if anything, the resolution reaffirms the primacy of need for the United States to be a true "honest broker" in the peace talks, Jewish observers say.

This image likely weighed heavily in America's decision to abstain, as U.S. officials appeared intent on not antagonizing their other allies in the Middle East. U.S. national security adviser Sandy Berger said the abstention was "motivated by a very deep concern" for Israel, but was informed by security and intelligence sources who had advised that Palestinians would greet a veto with a potentially explosive reaction, and "diminish if not end our ability to end the violence."

Nevertheless, a number of Jewish activists expressed "disappointment" and "dismay" that the United States didn't veto the resolution. For the most part, though, they were careful not to criticize President Bill Clinton too loudly.

The American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), however, said "by not vetoing this one-sided attack, the United States has lent support to those nations seeking to isolate Israel. At this critical time, it is imperative for the United States to stand by Israel, as efforts continue to put an end to Palestinian violence."

Sources indicate, however, the UN resolution would have been much harsher if not for the intervention of U.S. Ambassador Richard Holbrooke and others.

'A recurring nightmare'

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

This article was written just after the Yom Kippur weekend.

JERUSALEM — Israelis are feeling disappointed, anxious and sad in the wake of nearly two weeks of violence.

"The situation is sad," said a tour guide in Jerusalem. "I don't see how there can be peace with [Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser] Arafat anymore. The Palestinians said they'll take care of Joseph's Tomb and then they go and destroy it."

The rioting, which broke out the day before Rosh Hashanah, has Israelis wondering what will happen next.

"The situation is very difficult," said Shai, 27. "I'm carrying a gun now. I never carry it, but now you never know what's going to happen."

On a recent Sunday morning, for example, Shai is among only a handful of Israelis walking down Ben Yehuda Street, which is in the heart of downtown Jerusalem and is usually brimming with people. A number of Israelis have chosen to stay away from crowded places in fear of terrorist attacks, while others try to stay away from the capital city itself.

Ruth Eglash, who lives in Maoz Zion just outside of Jerusalem, went to the capital city's mall last week. She relates that she was one of the only ones there. "It was strange that it was so empty," she said.

The Old City has also been empty. Usually packed with Israelis and tourists on a Saturday afternoon, the narrow cobblestone streets have, over the past two weekends, resembled a ghost town rather than a busy market.

When the violence first erupted, Arab storeowners went on strike to show Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat their support. But after a few days, the striking storeowners were reportedly given the option to reopen the shops that serve as their livelihood.

"The strike in the Old City is theoretically optional," explained Nadir, a Christian Arab storeowner who has not sold anything since the fighting broke out. "But only stores selling food can be open. The rest of us have to close our doors. We're not allowed to sell to the tourists. Israel doesn't care if we're open or not. The Palestinians keep us closed."

"Yasser Arafat doesn't care about the general Palestinian public. He is using them as a means to an end," said another Christian Arab storeowner in the Old City, who has been banned by Palestinian Arabs from working while the riots are taking place. "He got his ratings up. That's what he wanted."

The situation is a "recurring nightmare," said Eglash, who witnessed the intifadah in the early 1990s. "I think the violence is being planned; it is not spontaneous as the foreign media will have you believe. It is too cozy having the riots around Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur."

Most foreign media reports have failed to mention that the fighting coincided with the Jewish New Year and the Ten Days of Repentance. The reports also blame right-wing politician Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount as the provocation behind the clashes.

"To blame Ariel Sharon is wrong. I don't like him, but every Jew has a right to visit the Temple Mount," said a restaurant owner who pointed out that the rioting began the day after Sharon's visit which was erev Rosh Hashanah.

The clashes of the last two weeks are the worst Israelis have seen in a long time.

"Everyone is very tense. No one is sure of what will happen next," said Steve Linde, an editor at Israel Radio. "It is clear that the Palestinians have decided not to keep to [Prime Minister Ehud] Barak's ultimatum. And there's going to have to be intense international pressure for both sides to come back to negotiations. The alternative measure is too scary to think about."

The violence has Israelis rethinking their views on the peace process and whether a peace can exist in the Middle East.

"I never thought there could be peace with Arafat or the Palestinians and this fighting shows I was right," said teenager Hadassah Even-Chen. "The violence is very tragic but we have to respond with strength and force because that's all the Palestinians understand."

"If peace is built on trust," said an Israeli who works with Palestinians towards coexistence, "then Arafat has broken that trust. I don't think he has proven himself, but I do think peace can exist. It will just take a lot longer to achieve. These past two weeks make me feel both sides have lost control. It is going to be more difficult to return to the peace process."

"There can only be peace with the Palestinians if it is good for them," said Shai of Jerusalem, who refused to give his surname. "Arafat is a terrorist – he always was and always will be. [But] he's the least crazy out of all of them, and if we can, we should make a deal with him."

Merav Ginou, a university student in Jerusalem, said a full-out war is unlikely, but admitted that she is still worried.

"I don't know what will happen," she said. "But negotiations must continue."

Israelis are undecided about Barak's role in the fighting. His cabinet ministers have offered the most criticism so far.

"After Barak says he will do something, he should do it. He can't keep giving warnings, because then we look weak," MK Gidon Ezra told Israel Radio.

"The situation is as grave as it ever was," said MK Tommy Lapid, as Barak's 48-hour deadline to release the three captured soldiers loomed. "To abruptly stop negotiations is not the correct way to go. On the other hand, we can't continue with how things are now."

"Mr. Barak always puts a deadline, then ignores his own deadlines," Lapid said on radio. "What is important is whether we can continue negotiations."

According to a Jerusalem Post poll, Barak's support has gone down among Israelis during the fighting, whereas the clashes have raised Arafat's status among his people.

"The Palestinians need violence to be put in good standing with the world," said the tour guide, who added that Israel was seen by the world as the do-gooder in the negotiations before the violence erupted. "Arafat was seen among his people as weak and his support was low. Now he has gained popularity and the world is back on his side."

"The violence has hit Israel harder than it has for a long time," said Israel Radio's Linde. "It has come into Israeli cities, including Nazareth and Jerusalem proper. If there's an escalation of violence it could be a threat to peace between Israel and the Palestinians or any of the other Arab countries."

Moroccan-born singer brings Edith Piaf to life

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Fans of the late French chanteuse Edith Piaf, affectionately known as the Little Sparrow, have been flocking to see singer/songwriter Raquel Bitton's critically acclaimed show, Raquel Bitton Sings Edith Piaf, Her Story... Her Songs.

Moroccan-born, San Francisco-based Bitton began performing her sold-out, self-produced concerts at New York's Carnegie Hall at the beginning of the year. She has since put on the show at a number of venues, including Montreal's Place des Arts, and will be appearing at Toronto's Massey Hall on Nov. 4 at 8 p.m.

Bitton says she is not an imitator of Piaf, but an interpreter of her music and life story. Ironically, it wasn't in French Morocco that Bitton discovered her father's old Piaf records, but in America, where her family immigrated when Bitton was 11.

"I understood my voice had to find a niche, and the greatest niche for me was [Piaf's] repertoire that was born between 1920 and 1947," Bitton says.

Raquel Bitton

A 20-piece orchestra backs Bitton's performance. She listened to more than 450 Piaf recordings and hand-picked 24, some not ever sung live by Piaf herself. The evening's musical offerings include the heart-wrenching La Vie En Rose and Pleure Pas (Don't Cry), as well as more upbeat numbers like Les Flons Flons Du Ball (The Happy Sounds Of A Ball).

In addition to the songs, mostly in French, Bitton tells the story of Piaf's music and life, in English.

"Piaf's story is unusual. She had a tragic life from birth to 17, and she rose to be the highest paid performer in the world, thanks to Jewish French composer Raymond Assot, who took her from the streets to the great theatres. She died penniless at the age of 47 in 1963," Bitton says.

"Her songs mirror everybody's life, so it was so easy for me to capture the repertoire; and because of my Jewish background, I am a natural storyteller. I always say before my show that there will be only one Piaf, but out of her ashes will come new voices that she inspired. I am deeply inspired, I love my life with its up and downs and don't need to be her."

Piaf's connection to the Jews of Europe was deep. "Piaf was responsible for helping Jews during World War II," Bitton says. "Piaf was considered the den mother of Stalag 3. She would take pictures of prisoners and come back with false identification, claiming that these 'musicians' played with her. She would go in with a trio and come out with a chamber orchestra."

Bitton says she was not attracted to Piaf by her tragic life, but by the words of her songs. Piaf's lyrics captivated Bitton with compelling stories of every-day life that grabbed her heart.

Bitton travelled to Paris in 1992 to film a PBS documentary about the French songbird. While there, she encountered Charles Dumont, composer of Piaf's signature song Non, Je Ne Regrette Rien (No Regrets), and Henri Contet, writer of many Piaf favourites. Contet was impressed by the American singer's talent and kept in touch with her. The two last met in Paris in January 1998, three months prior to his death at age 92.

Bitton's early life was also burdened with hardships. The natural talent, who had performed at the casino in Marrakesh at the age of seven, moved with her family to Casablanca, where both parents worked for the American Air Force. Tragedy hit when her oldest brother, a soldier in the Israeli army, was killed during the Six Day War.

His death was covered by the media, making the family uncomfortable living in Morocco and they emigrated. The Bitton family arrived in California with nothing. The singer credits the Jewish organization ORT for helping her family in San Francisco.

Things are now good for the mother of two, Julian, 12, and Natalie Sabrine, 10. Bitton has recorded four CDs – I Wish You Love, Changes, In A Jazzy Mood and Raquel Bitton Sings Edith Piaf...The Golden Album.

Gerald Prolman, Bitton's husband of 14 years, sold his successful business and has spent the last year devoting his time to his wife's career. Since his involvement, she has signed on with the William Morris Agency and Higher Octave Music/Virgin Records. Her plans include recording a fifth album inspired by Black American artists who came to Paris in the 1920s, as well as a sixth CD of her own compositions.

So successful was her first Carnegie Hall appearance that Bitton has been invited back to to perform with conductor Skitch Henderson and the New York Pops.

To catch Raquel Bitton in concert at Massey Hall, call 416-872-4255. Tickets cost from $35 to $85.

Matt Cohen's posthumous memoir adds insight to his legacy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Matt Cohen, the celebrated novelist, never got over the gnawing feeling that, as a Jew, he was essentially an outsider in Canada.

In his posthumous memoir, Typing: A Life in 26 Keys (Random House), Cohen observes that Canada's greatest novelists, including Margaret Atwood and Robertson Davies, gained a dominant place in the Canadian public imagination.

"All of them were writing out of a conservative, small-town centred, restrained Protestant tradition that found a tremendous echo of self-recognition across the country.

"But for writers of a slightly younger generation, for example the offbeat, very unconservative, unProtestant, unrestrained offspring of a completely different cultural and religious tradition, which I happened to be, no such echo was to be found."

As a result, Cohen was convinced that he was simply "spinning his wheels" and working harder to write more books for fewer readers.

In the penultimate pages of this brooding, sometimes poignant work, which he finished in the last six months of his life, Cohen summarizes his views on this delicate issue. As he puts it:

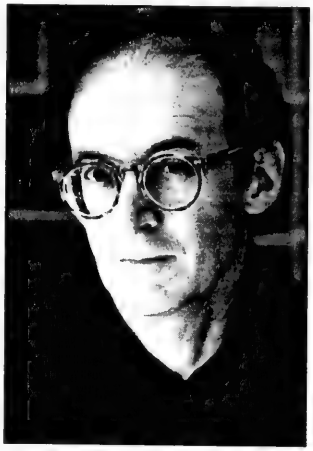
"One of the strange things about being a writer in Canada ... is the gradual realization that if one is not writing books that represent the white, conservative, middle-class and Protestant values of the literary establishment, one is forever destined to be seen ... as unimportant and marginal..."

These bracing comments are typical of Typing, which is published about a year after Cohen succumbed to cancer at the age of 56.

Cohen, as he appears here, is a refreshingly honest and direct memoirist nagged by self-doubts and weighed down by invariably constant financial insecurities.

Born in Kingston, the scion of an assimilationist family not unfamiliar with anti-Semitism, he studied science at the University of Toronto before switching into the arts and social sciences.

When Cohen was 21 and drifting, his father, a chemist, presented him with a portable Olivetti typewriter. But Cohen had already begun to write seriously, having unsuccessfully submitted short stories to a raft of American magazines. "In the end," he acknowledges, "I wrote because I was lonely..."



Matt Cohen

Canadian historian George Grant (Lament for a Nation) recommended Cohen for a teaching job at McMaster University's department of religion. But on the eve of Cohen's interview, Grant warned him to play down his Jewishness. Such was the temper of the times in Canadian academia in the early 1960s.

As Cohen freely admits, he knew nothing about religion, save from what he had learned at Hebrew school. Yet it didn't seem to matter.

In short order, Cohen left McMaster and became writer-in-residence at Rochdale College in Toronto. However, he did not really launch his writing career until meeting fledgling publisher Dennis Lee and tearing a ligament in a pickup basketball game. Confined to a cast for two weeks, he started his first novel, Korsoniloff, a dud.

Cohen's fifth book, The Disinherited, was a breakthrough for him. But, having been an all-consuming effort, it wrecked his marriage.

He claims he "discovered" his voice at 30. "My discovery of my own voice came along with the realization that I was the kind of writer who wrote much better when I was writing about other people."

In 1979, with The Sweet Second Summer of Kitty Malone behind him, the editor Anna Porter advised Cohen to explore a Jewish theme that would reveal more about himself. "Anna had often told me I should write fiction that was more personal and more Jewish."

Heeding her advice, he produced The Spanish Doctor, an historical novel set in 15th century Spain and brimming with Jewish characters. It received a scathing reception in Canada.

Throughout Typing, there are fleeting references to his precarious finances. On page 162, he writes: "And, as usual, I was flat broke." Some 30 pages later in this 248-page memoir, he takes note of the fact that he had a grand total of $200 in his bank account, and that he depended on journalism and book reviewing for a living.

Cohen, a self-effacing person I once had the pleasure of interviewing, was so devastated by the poor reviews garnered by Nadine (1986) and Emotional Arithmetic (1990) that he pronounced himself "totally washed up." At a low ebb, he wrote: "The world of books had come to seem entirely artificial and contrived, and books themselves optimistic little fairy tales that couldn't touch or contain what I was going through."

The critical success of Elizabeth and After, Cohen's last novel before his untimely death on Dec. 2, 1999, lifted his spirits. It should have. The book won the Governor General's Award for fiction. But within weeks of its publication, he felt "something had gone dead inside me." He had lung cancer. Cohen was taken from us too soon, but his legacy as a formidable writer lives on.

Steeped in the vernacular: Too often this column receives press releases and circulars promoting new theatrical works crafted by trendy artists with their fingers apparently on the pulse of the vernacular of pop culture, as evidenced in movies, music and trash-TV.

The post-post-modern esthetic, obsessed with death and the grotesque, has seemingly banished its heroes and ideals to the underworld. Or so one might gather, upon glimpsing the disturbing promotional photograph for E-llusions, a new play written and directed by Igal Hecht, and produced by Chutzpa Productions.

The poster shows a man, wearing only underwear, standing over another man and forcing the barrel of a revolver into his mouth, as a young woman, dressed in a high-school blouse and tie and a miniskirt, looks upon this demeaning scene of victimization and violence.

The play is supposedly an exploration of the cultural world of the post-Generation-X demographic group (dubbed "Generation E"). It is, we are told, an admittedly confused "journey into the human mind" that contains "all the elements of a drug-induced fantasy."

Despite its unappealing veneer, E-llusions may yet have merit; this is, after all, the era of Fargo and Pulp Fiction. Featuring actors Ron Furman and Raquel Michailov, E-llusions runs Oct. 18 to 22 at the Poor Alex. Tickets $10 in advance (416-324-9863), $12 at the door.

Eye On Arts invites communication from any playgoer able to contradict our considerable apprehensions regarding this production.

A hitchhikers' guide to the exotic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If you're one of those travellers drawn irresistibly to the exotic and somewhat mysterious allure of Asia, the following guidebooks should be of interest.

Laos, known as the Land of a Million Elephants, is one of the least developed countries in southeast Asia. Torn by war until quite recently, it is probably what Thailand looked like decades ago.

Until the 1990s, few tourists ventured into Laos, a nation blessed by scenic landscape and golden temples and palaces. But now, with the onset of peace, the trickle has turned into a stream.

If you plan to visit, pick up Lonely Planet's Laos, the third edition of which is distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books. A fact-packed compendium filled with lovely color photographs, it will surely whet your appetite for Laos.

Not being as isolated as Laos, Vietnam gets far more tourists than its neighbor.

The fifth edition of Lonely Planet's Vietnam explains why it is such an attractive destination. Flip through its pages and your senses will be awakened to bustling cities, picturesque outdoor markets, unspoiled beaches, lush jungles and rugged mountains, glistening rice paddies and exquisite temples. And as an added plus, the Vietnamese are extremely friendly and hospitable.

Japan, being the most developed country in Asia, is terribly expensive, even by Western standards. However, if you take Lonely Planet's The Hitchhiker's Guide To Japan to heart, you will get by relatively cheaply.

BY BILL GLADSTONE

THE BATTLE OF JOSEPH'S TOMB

"Joseph's bones, which the children of Israel had brought up from Egypt, they buried in Shechem, in the portion of the field that Jacob acquired from the children of Hamor, the father of Shechem, for a hundred kesitahs; and it became a heritage for the children of Joseph." – Joshua 24:32.

One of the casualties of the disturbances in Israel this month was Joseph's Tomb in Nablus – Shechem of the Bible.

It was a simple white-domed building built in honour of Joseph, perhaps one of the most blessed and illustrious Biblical figures prior to David. It was situated in the largest Palestinian town in the West Bank, a place where few Jews have dared to venture.

There has supposedly been a perpetual Jewish presence at Joseph's Tomb and other key religious sites in Israel since the beginning of the exile, nearly 2,000 years ago.

It's hard to get information about Joseph's Tomb. The Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, normally so ready to supply brochures and information about places in Israel proper, had not a word of description to offer about this Jewish holy site on the West Bank. For obvious reasons, they don't encourage tourists to go there.

Of the four or five Israel guidebooks on my shelf, only Lonely Planet (1992 edition) makes reference to Joseph's Tomb. Lonely Planet says it is similar to Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem, and relates that IDF soldiers were then guarding it to keep the precarious, pre-Oslo peace.

Rabbi Lawrence Hoffman's Israel: A Spiritual Travel Guide (Jewish Lights, 1998) lavishes appropriate attention on Rachel's Tomb and the tombs of the patriarchs and matriarchs in Hebron, but makes no mention of Joseph's traditional burying ground.

The Internet allows the curious to learn something of the Tomb's recent history. It is not, sad to say, a place of repose.

There is a Jewish enclave in Nablus, surrounded by territory controlled by the Palestinian Authority – actually, the PLO.

There is a yeshiva at the Tomb. Five years ago, some students had sought to pray all night at the Tomb. The PLO, wrathful, asserted that the Jews were plotting to establish a synagogue. There were clashes, shootouts and standoffs.

During the "tunnel" riots of September 1996, a Palestinian mob firebombed the Tomb, burnt army jeeps and prayerbooks, and killed six Israelis. Washington Post columnist Charles Krauthammer called the episode "the Middle Eastern equivalent of a mob of whites torching a black church, killing parishioners and burning its holy objects."

The remaining Jews were evacuated. Not surprisingly, many returned. The Tomb was rebuilt. In December 1996, the yeshiva students drove up to the Tomb in an armoured car under the watchful eyes of Israeli troops, Palestinian police and CNN telecameras.

Now, sadly, Joseph's Tomb is back in the news. And it may stay there for some time. During the latest attack, a Palestinian mob abducted and murdered Rabbi Hillel Lieberman, a second cousin to Joseph Lieberman, the U.S. Democratic vice-presidential candidate.

Palestinian construction workers sent to repair the trashed Tomb have painted its dome green, the colour of Islam, prompting an Israeli Army officer to remark that they are attempting to turn "a Jewish holy place into a Muslim mosque."

The spirit of peace is not dead; it has just gone temporarily underground. In the meantime, travellers to Israel are advised to exercise heightened caution.

Last week, Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade warned Canadian visitors not to travel into east Jerusalem (including the Old City), the West Bank and Gaza, Nazareth and areas of the Galilee. It also advised Canadians to be especially cautious in Jaffa, and especially alert while in transit anywhere in Israel.

For updated advisories or bulletins from the Department, visit the Web site http://voyage.dfaitmaeci. gc.ca/ destinations/menu_e.htm

Settling the confusion over Tova concerts

TORONTO — There is some confusion between the two upcoming, very different Theresa Tova concerts.

Through cooling days and longer nights, let Royal keep your dwelling bright

Recently, after 20 years at its Avenue Rd. location, Royal Lighting expanded its showroom for the second time in the past year. This well-lit, spacious showroom lets Royal spread merchandise out to show each piece in the best light. Set close to the sidewalk, illuminated till 1 a.m., the high, wide windows let the featured pieces sparkle like diamonds.

Inside, there's as much viewing space as in the windows. And the quantity and range of lighting products has been expanded to match the space.

These bright windows carry a message: Lighting is one of the most esthetically satisfying ways to upgrade your home.

For practical reasons as well, fall is a good time for lighting upgrades. During cooler weather, you spend more time indoors with family or guests. Thinking about a dining room chandelier, or pot lights for the rec room, to make your home warmer and brighter? Whatever you need, it's here at Royal.

With 200 different suppliers, Royal carries a huge range of lights and fixtures for every budget, need and taste from economy lines (e.g. bulbs by the case), to upscale hand-crafted work such as Schonbek crystal. "Our selection," says Royal's Michael Gladstone, "is probably Toronto's best."

This includes a full range of accessories. There are lampshades, for example, in case you want a new shade for a fine old lamp.

You'll find lamps in every price, size, style and color: halogen and non-halogen; modern and traditional; table, desk, wall, floor, study and reading lamps. There are line voltage lights, and low-voltage lights which let you install a halogen bulb transformer; track and recess lighting; and many specialty bulbs.

Royal also carries a wide crystal selection, both in traditional styles, and less ornate, square-cut contemporary forms. Crystal goes well with traditional decor, or finishes like Chinese black lacquer, which reflects light brilliantly. Let Royal help match your choice to your home.

Not only can lighting contribute to the beauty of your dwelling. It also enhances safety and convenience.

Royal stocks a wide range of outdoor fixtures including low-voltage lights, garden sets, and garage and outside door lamps — both for nighttime safety and convenience, and a pleasant outdoor atmosphere.

Brightening your porch or verandah, for example, makes it easier for you and your guests to get from their cars to your door and back. And Royal has a full selection of lights and fixtures for lawn, garden, garage or driveway. They will even illimunate a backyard rink for your kids.

Royal is one of Toronto's major fan dealers. It's Canada's largest Casablance dealer, with fans ranging from $99 to $1,600.

Yes, a fan can make your home more comfortable in cool weather, by distributing warm air evenly. It doesn't change the temperature: it creates comfort by moving air from warmer rooms to cooler ones, and thus saves heating costs.

In many two-storey houses, for example, the top floor is often too hot in winter. A properly positioned stairwell fan can remedy this, moving warm air down from the second floor.

Today, most ceiling fans are reversible: they blow air downward in summer; and in winter, they blow upward, drawing cooler air from the lower part of the room and pushing warm air down from the ceiling. Also, they disperse tobacco smoke.

Ceiling fans come with lights, or lights can be added, thus replacing fixtures. They come in 36-, 42- and 52- inch sizes, in many different styles and colors, with pull chains, switches or remote control. Some can be set to turn on at a certain temperature— and, for security, to turn lights on and off at random.

Royal's experienced, well-informed staff make sure you go home with the product you want. They know what questions to ask. If you buy a lamp, for example, staff will ask about window illumination, wall color, fixture location and other variables, including your tastes.

"We're a full-service store," Gladstone emphasizes. "When you spend money, you want personal attention."

Every salesperson is an accredited lighting consultant. You enjoy the same service as the many designers, decorators and builders who buy lighting and fixtures here.

One Glen Park reinvents the condominium

If the free spirit in you rebels at the notion of "downsizing" as you grow older, you'll be happy to know that at least one developer agrees with you.

David Feldman, President of Camrost-Felcorp, sets a new standard in elegant living with the launch of One Glen Park, an exclusive collection of condominium residences. It's only fitting that this cutting-edge development should occur in North York, where Camrost-Felcorp's previous successes include Village Gate, the Madison Centre, the Residences of Manhattan and Madison, and the Hollywood Plaza Grand Regent.

Barbara Klein, Community Sales Manager for Camrost-Felcorp, is well-acquainted with the frustration of prospective buyers who dread being shoehorned into smaller quarters — and their elation at finding an alternative. "Downsizing sounds great, until you're the one being downsized," she says. "This project is not just another condominium; it's a solution for people who want to not only maintain their existing lifestyle, but enhance it." Those disenchanted with boxlike offerings at other projects have found, with One Glen Park, that "they're not losing a home, they're moving into a better one. It's a house in condo's clothing," says Klein.

Keeping Shabbos dinner where it belongs

Many have been so taken with the concept that they've purchased multiple units, and customized them to their taste — effectively building a brand new "dream home."

Equal space, with amenities galore — and without the hassles of property maintenance and security. What does it all mean?

It means Shabbos dinner for 20 is still Shabbos dinner for 20 — in your own home, not at your daughter's because you don't have room. It means you can still "run a restaurant" in your kitchen — a new, state-of-the-art kitchen that will make cooking for family and friends a greater pleasure than ever. (For larger gatherings, the well-appointed party room has kitchenette facilities suitable for on-site catering).

It means that when they visit, your children and grandchildren can surf the web to their hearts' content on the Rogers Wave high-speed connection. This feature, notes Klein, is typical of One Glen Park's intrinsic value and attention to detail. "The quality is built in from floor to ceiling," she beams. "Features that are extra elsewhere are standard here."

Among many others, these features include spacious balconies, nine-foot ceilings in the main living areas, designer kitchens with state-of-the-art appliances, and elegant master ensuite baths complete with whirlpool.

You'll also enjoy private underground parking, an attentive concierge, and two custom-designed elevators, with one serving as a Shabbos elevator.

Ironclad security means you can pick up and leave at a moment's notice and travel without having to worry about your property or your vehicle.

One Glen Park also offers a number of other features other condos don't, like individual heating and cooling pumps, so you don't get stuck with inflated bills from shared heating and air conditioning. A complete fitness centre that would make an Olympian proud will allow you to enjoy the benefits of exercise year-round, as well as a rejuvenating steam shower.

As the Crown Jewel of Camrost-Felcorp's "Signature Collection", One Glen Park offers an array of options and finishes limited only to your imagination. Most buyers, she says, are taking full advantage — especially at the pre-construction prices in effect as of this writing.

Perhaps the greatest advantage of One Glen Park is its location. For those who've spent the better part of their adult lives in the Bathurst / Glencaim area, moving into One Glen Park means remaining connected to the old and familiar — shopping, restaurants, bakeries, synagogues. As one buyer noted, "You don't know how much it means to be able to walk to shul, the same shul I've gone to for 30 years — and to know that I'm still within walking distance of my children."

Pre-construction prices for limited time only

In the broader sense, living at One Glen Park means being part of a community, says Klein. Many purchasers to date were friends or neighbours to begin with, and were drawn to the project by word of mouth. Underscoring the neighbourly feeling is a main lobby, complete with fireplace, that would be the envy of the Waldorf Astoria. Upon seeing the artist's rendering, one buyer was moved to declare, "I guess now I'll have to wear designer shorts to pick up the mail!" — to which his wife retorted, "it's about time!"

Units range in price from $348,800 to just over $1 million, with considerable savings still available on a variety of features and options. Designer shorts are negotiable.

Walking through Jewish history in London, England

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

"No schlepping, please", announces our tour guide, Shaughan, in a resonant baritone voice.

Shaughan is shepherding us through London's East End alleys and the back streets of colourful Whitechapel and Spitalfields, as he unravels "a tale of synagogues and sweatshops."

We had previously taken another walking tour with Shaughan, a professional actor as well as a certified guide, who was known for his well-researched and amusing anecdotes and who would occasionally break into a song or two. We knew we would be in good hands.

As this tour was focused on a more recent period in the life of the British Jewish community, I decided to acquaint myself with the beginnings of Jewish immigration to England.

I found the perfect source of historical information at the Jewish Museum, located in an elegant Victorian building (The Raymond Burton House, Camden Town, 129-131 Albert St., London NW1 7NB, www.jewmusm.ort.org) close to one of the most exotic and brash outdoor markets in the city, the Camden Lock Market.

The museum is divided into three main areas: the Ceremonial Art Gallery, the Temporary Exhibition Gallery, and the History Gallery. And it is here, within the discreet elegance of the History Gallery that one can get acquainted with the history of British Jewry, through well-documented panels, a large variety of objects, posters, portraits, and a very cleverly designed interactive map of the history of Jewish settlements in England.

There is no evidence of any settlement of Jews in England prior to 1066, when William the Conqueror encouraged the Ashkenazi Jews of Rouen, the capital city of Normandy, to settle in London. More Jews followed, also settling in York, Canterbury, Oxford, Lincoln and Winchester, as well as in a number of smaller towns and villages.

Excluded by all trade and craft guilds, most Jews became moneylenders, thereby, in fact, providing England with its first banking system.

Others worked as pawnbrokers, doctors and traders. The community also included several learned rabbis who contributed to Tosafot (supplements to the Talmud).

In the 12th century, during the Crusades, anti-Jewish feelings generated attacks against the Jews. Although they benefited from some occasional protection – as in Lincoln, where the Bishop Hugh of Avenon extended his personal protection to the community – the situation soon deteriorated.

At York, mobs killed all Jews they could find, then laid siege to the rest of the Jewish community. The 150 remaining Jews committed suicide rather than fall into the hands of the mob.

King Edward I arrested and imprisoned 600 Jews from all over England in the Tower of London, and 270 of them were hanged and their property confiscated.

Finally, in 1290, more than 200 years before the Spanish Inquisition's Edict of Expulsion, Edward I expelled all Jews living in England at the time, and for a period of over 360 years, there was no Jewish community or place of worship in the British Isles.

Thus, England had the dubious honour of being the first nation to expel all its Jews.

The return of the Jews to England happened as a consequence of a number of apparently disparate events. One reason was the constant Jewish need to find places to live according to their faith and traditions.

Following the 1492 expulsion from Spain, many Spanish Jews fled to Portugal; however, in 1497, the Jews of Portugal were ordered to be baptized, thus becoming New Christians or Marranos. To escape persecution by the newly installed Portuguese Inquisition, many of these New Christians emigrated from Portugal to London, officially as Catholics, but secretly practising Judaism.

Jews returned after expulsions

Another factor that contributed to the return of Jews to England was an interesting turn of events which took place around the ascent of Puritanism and the establishment of the English Commonwealth.

In spite of crucial religious differences, Puritans and Jews held important beliefs in common, such as the veneration of the Hebrew Bible and the fulfilment of the promise of the Messiah.

The Puritans' were therefore well disposed towards the return of the Jews, but they also believed that once the Jews were exposed to the Puritan's form of Christianity – so different from the pomp of the Catholic faith – they would accept Jesus as the Messiah and the Second Coming would take place.

About the same time, Rabbi Menasseh ben Israel, a well respected Amsterdam rabbi, relied on a notion that England was the key to the Redemption and set to work to convince Oliver Cromwell to favour the readmission of the Jews to England. After a number of setbacks, the bill was finally passed on February 1656 under King Charles II.

I pick up the thread of the story as Shaughan escorts us to the Bevis Marks Synagogue, England's oldest synagogue, in the heart of the "City" of London. In 1701, the Bevis Marks Synagogue replaced the first Jewish house of worship in nearby Creechurch Lane, dating from 1657.

The synagogue, discreetly located in an interior court (Bevis Marks St., London EC3, tel.171 626 1274), has hardly changed since the ever growing Spanish Portuguese community paid Joseph Avis, a Quaker builder, L2,650 to build them a magnificent place of worship modelled after the synagogue in Amsterdam.

Over the years, the Bevis Marks Synagogue became the stage for the development of the Anglo-Jewish community, a place of worship, a forum for exchanging ideas, and also a centre for extending charity to needy Jews in England. Its venerable walls have witnessed close to 300 years of stories and events.

Next to its superb wooden ark is the seat – the only one with hand rests and a foot stool – initially reserved for the famous philanthropist Moses Montefiore (1784-1885), and later on for his descendants, guests of honour and royalty.

Legend has it that underneath its seven stately candelabras, Isaac d'Israeli was refused the bar mitzvah of his son, Benjamin, following some internal disagreements. Apparently, this led to his conversion which, in turn, opened the way for Disraeli to become prime minister of England.

The synagogue's 400 candles have shone over many illustrious visitors such as Prince Philip and the Lord Mayor of London.

As the Jewish community started gaining civil rights and respect, its members rose to a variety of important positions: Lord Chief Justice, members of Parliament, no less than eight Lord Mayors, even a Viceroy of India.

Leaving the synagogue, we continue our walk through the nearby neighbourhoods of Whitechapel and Spitalfields, where almost every street and every house have stories to tell, stories about the poverty of the refugees from Eastern Europe persecution and pogroms, stories about backbreaking labour and renewed hope, about individual struggle and community support.

We walk through Petticoat Lane, now renamed Middlesex Street, the locale of the shmatte trade; we visit the former site of the Free School and discover that this excellent Jewish school is still very much operative today, and it is still free; we admire the elaborate architecture of the "Soup Kitchen for the Jewish Poor," which provided food for the needy between 1902 and 1950 and is now on its way to conversion into luxury apartments after a few decades as a kosher ice-cream factory; we stroll by the original 17th-century Huguenot tenements that became a Jewish ghetto, now being renovated into fancy expensive townhouses; we gaze upon the rendering of a violin embedded in a sidewalk, a memento of Mr. Adler's Yiddish Theatre which, in 1880, left England for the Goldene Medina, America.

We finally part from Shaughan, our genial Scots Irish guide, who recites for us – with much gusto – a poem about Jewish children, throws in a few Yiddish words for good measure, and waves to us a theatrical "Shalom!".

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO—Multi-faceted artist, Sophie Katz, 80, will have her first major commercial exhibition at the Nathan Shiff Gallery from Oct. 26 to Nov. 18. The opening reception with the artist will be held on Oct. 25 from 6 p.m. to 9 p.m.

Interviewed in her Sheppard area home, surrounded by her eclectic paintings, sculptures, carved wood, papier maché, displays of jewelry and multi-media works, Katz spoke of her previous exhibitions at several venues including York University.

Sophie Katz

Her passion for primary colours is evident. These are reflected in her oils, acrylic, watercolour, and egg tempra paintings in both the realism and abstract modes.

Her abstracts reflect her scientific background and her love of forms such as crystals. This is also evident in some of her creative jewelry designs which incorporate astronomical features.

Katz was born in Warsaw, Poland and although she arrived with her parents in Montreal at the age of six, she recalls much of her life in Poland and her crossing to Canada. Her father, Rubin Myer Halpern spoke 13 languages.

In Montreal, she attended McGill University where she received a bachelor of science degree in biochemistry in 1941. She joined the staff of the National Research Council in Ottawa as a research assistant in the lab of Dr. Morris Katz, who she later married.

She received a teaching certificate and taught at the Hillel Academy, Ottawa's Hebrew Day School. After she moved to Toronto, she worked at York University on the NASA space project in a lab that did research on hazardous conditions.

In mid-life, says Katz, "I decided to pursue a long cherished goal, that of going to art school." After six years of study, she graduated from the Ontario College of Art and continued her studies at the School of Fine Arts at York University. Her background in science combined with her creative talents have led to the diversified works both personal and mythological.

The exhibition at the Shiff Gallery, she says, will include a bronze sculpture of three women titled, Escape from the Past—past, present and future.

Among her paintings will be an acrylic titled, the Cosmic Chicken which represents work of a famous psychiatrist. And her jewelry will feature a variety of stones, silver, gold and other materials.

Katz says that she has written a poem for every piece or painting explaining that there is a theme in every one of her works.

The Nathan Shiff Gallery is located at 1252 Danforth Ave. at Greenwood. The gallery is open Tuesday to Saturday from 1 p.m. to 6 p.m. For more information call, 416-463-8957 or fax 416-463-8355.

Israeli and Palestinian scientists collaborate

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a unique relationship, Israeli and Palestinian scientists have linked laboratories to try and discover why hearing loss in infants is four times greater in the Middle East than in Western nations.

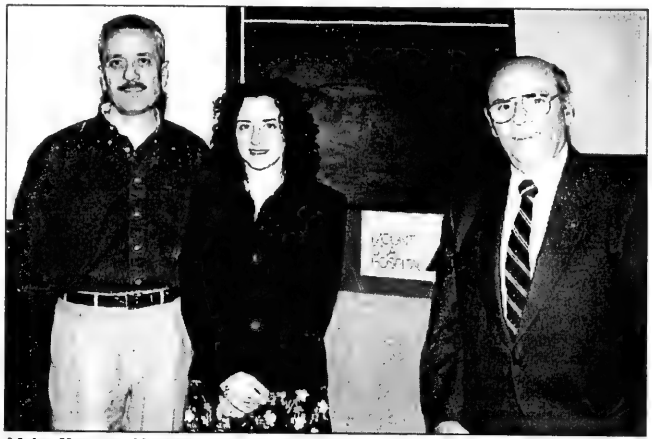
Researchers Karen Avraham of Tel Aviv University and Moien Kanaan of Bethlehem University in the Palestinian Authority are working together to study the genetics of hearing loss, a problem that is prevalent in both Israelis and Arabs.

The scientists led a recent workshop at Mount Sinai Hospital sponsored by the Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), based at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University of Toronto.

The non-governmental, charitable organization, which supports the basic science work of Avraham and Kanaan, is dedicated to enriching academic medicine and health care in Canada and internationally, and to contribute to peace building in the Middle East by providing academic, financial and direct collaborative support for a variety of programs.

Recently, CISEPO, which was formed in 1984, launched a project to screen 12,000 newborn Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian infants in the Middle East. The project combined the efforts of almost 75 hospitals and clinics through the CISEPO-supported Middle East Association for Managing Hearing Loss.

The collaboration, which is a model for peace building in the Middle East, said Abraham, "is not specific to the field of hearing loss, but serves as a model for other conditions, as well."



Moien Kanaan of Bethlehem University (left) and Karen Avraham of Tel Aviv University presented their studies on the genetics of hearing loss at Mount Sinai Hospital. Dr. Arnold Noyek (right) is chair of the Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program, which sponsored the workshop along with University of Toronto.

Research into hearing loss has traditionally lagged behind other diseases, she said, but recently there have been "tremendous advances."

Work at the two labs involves working with families of deaf people, as well as deaf mice, because their inner structure is very similar, said Abraham.

"When the two labs began collaborating, we quickly established a scientific relationship. Today, we tend to trivialize the relationship because it came so easy, but it is not trivial.

"The great thing about science is that it can overcome borders; diseases are the same on both sides," she said.

The Middle East is unique in its population, said Kanaan, because there are "many isolated ethnic groups with high rates of inbreeding. Marriage patterns indicate that 40 percent to 50 percent of marriages are among first cousins or extended family. This encourages genetic abnormalities such as deafness.

"Palestinian deafness is double the rate of worldwide deafness. It is a significant problem, but no structures are in place to take care of deaf children. We are all interested in that problem. Science can transcend political boundaries," he said.

Hearing loss affects everyone, whether directly or indirectly, said Dr. Catherine Chalin, associate professor of public health sciences at the University of Toronto. "About one in 1,000 children are born with profound deafness, about two in 1,000 acquire it later on, and about one in four people have some kind of hearing loss by age 17."

In Canada, she said, there are no health policies in place with regards to hearing loss. "We are walking away from the strong measures we need to take in society.

"Many children and adults in Canada live in poverty, and in poverty there are repeated ear infections and trauma coupled with lack of help. Ignoring hearing loss as a public health issue causes disadvantaged children."

The collaboration between CISEPO and the two Middle East labs is a great opportunity to level the playing field, she said. "This collaboration will help all of us. Health, disease and disability should know no borders, just as we should know no borders.

"People should work together on common problems. The bottom line is that health is important to all people, not just in the immediate community, but in the world."

330 OBITUARIES

With profound sadness, we announce the passing of Gary Holt, age 46, of Winnipeg. He leaves to mourn his beloved family - wife Sara (Bernath), children Jonathan, David, Rachel & Carly, his parents, Molly & Bill Holt, his brother Murray Holt, sister Susie Holt-Ginden, nieces Laura & Jamie Holt and nephews Joey & Benji Rothman. As well, Gary leaves many dear friends and colleagues whose lives were enriched by his presence.

Following a year of study at Yeshiva University in Jerusalem, Gary graduated with a Bachelor of Commerce (Hons.) from the University of Manitoba. He became a Chartered Accountant and joined the family business, Industrial Metals, in 1979. His unparalleled integrity as a businessman gained him the respect and friendship of the many people he encountered in the scrap metal industry.

Gary's dedication to his faith and to the synagogue was tireless. His example instilled in his family the highest moral values, which they carry on. His greatest pride and joy were his children. He reveled in their exceptional academic achivements and artistic talents.

Gary was a kind, decent, gentle, honest, trusting and faithful friend. We treasure every moment he was with us.

Funeral services were held on Tuesday, October 3rd, at the Herzlia Synagogue and Shaarey Zedek Cemetery. Pallbearers were his dearest and closest friends, Frank Lavitt, Lewis Rosenberg, Mitch Cosman, David Greenberg, Steven Rosenfield, and brother-in-law, Jeff Ginden.

In honour of Gary's unforgettable life, donations will be gratefully accepted by Herzlia Adas Yeshurun Synagogue, 620 Brock St., Winnipeg, Manitoba R3N 0Z4 or Cancer Care Manitoba, P.O. Box 2248, Winnipeg, Manitoba R3C 4A6

Go in peace, Gary. You enhanced every life you touched. We miss you. We love you.

Senior golfer Fleisher is at top of his game

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Golfer Bruce Fleisher, who was in Winnipeg this summer to play in the AT&T Senior Open, is king of the over-50 set – 1999 Senior PGA Tour Rookie of the Year, Player of the Year and winner of the first two tournaments he played in

Despite his recent achievements, his rise was hardly an overnight success. It's true he won the U.S. Amateur crown in 1968 and certainly, that boded well for his pro career. He was young back then, talented and with the drive to make his dreams on the greens come true.

But it never happened. His PGA career never blossomed – until a few creative geniuses introduced the seniors' tour with a roster of golf legends, the likes of which had never been assembled.

Even then, who was to say that a pro golfer named Fleisher, whose previous successes were modest at best, would become the top player on the senior tour and have his handsome mug grace the cover of the senior PGA media guide?

Few would have been surprised if Jack Nicklaus, Lee Trevino, Hale Irwin or Tom Watson were the top money earners on the tour. But Fleisher, whose earnings are close to $2 million this year and $6 million in total, has won a total of 11 titles to date with the Good Ol' Boys.

"I'm good at waiting," he admitted. "I'm living a dream, and dreams do come true. From the U.S. Open in 1968 to the Club Pro Championship in '89 to the Bank of Boston in '91, I never gave up my dream when I turned 50 in 1999."

King of the over-50 set

How has life changed for the revived celebrity? "There are a lot of demands on my time. I felt like I was being pulled," he said. "Even the time off wasn't my time off. My wife Wendy and I just couldn't get off the band wagon. If it wasn't one thing it was another.

"This year," he continued, "I'm having a lot more fun with the appearances of Tom Watson, Lanny Wadkins, Tom Kite and others. There is less pressure on me. They're taking a lot of the fame."

For Fleisher, it's a rebirth. The tour keeps him in the limelight, allows him to pursue a latent dream and to enjoy the fruits of his labour.

"The senior tour is different," he explained. "There is no cut. Being in my 50s, I don't want that pressure again. It's more of a fun time and a fun place in our lives.

"To tee it up with Nicklaus, Trevino and Gary Player is such a privilege. To be in their presence, I can't explain it. I'll probably take it to my grave. These are guys I grew up with."

Fleisher praised his wife, Wendy, to whom he's been married for close to 31 years. "She's always been my biggest fan," he smiled. "She's my sports psychologist.

"She calms me down when I get nervous. I have a hard time on Sunday mornings if I'm in the running. She's been there through the thick and thin of it. She's one heck of a trooper."

Fleisher doesn't understate the importance of his earnings, but, he noted, "no matter how much money you've got in the bank, you're still trying to [live up to] that self-image that you portray of yourself, that you think you should be. The mind is such a fragile thing."

As is the case for most athletes, the gravy train can be rough at times. "It's a grind out there," he admitted. "You're going from hotel to hotel, from city to city, and it's hard."

The son of a Holocaust survivor who was always against his career playing golf seemed such an unrealistic way to make a living – Fleisher recalled his experiences in Israel with a sense of pride.

"I won a gold medal at the Maccabiah Games in 1969 as a player, and then again as a golf coach for the American men, women and seniors in 1989. It was an experience I'll never forget," he said.

"To swim in the Dead Sea, to see the Sea of Galilee and to climb to the top of Masada... Those are memories you can't take away."

Fleisher also takes satisfaction from family experiences. Even in his less productive years as a golfer, he got to watch his daughter Jessica grow up and his dad, in the final year-and-a-half of his life, was able to enjoy his son's success. His mom is still around to watch her son realize what once appeared to be an elusive dream.

As for Bruce's venture to friendly Manitoba, his numbers – 69, 69, 68 and 72, for a total of 278 – weren't sufficient to open the main vault and bag the top prize of $217,500, but he did finish fourth and take home $87,000, which ought to have made his trip north worthwhile.

Hockey eliminated from Maccabiah Games

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The left-wing lock and the neutral zone trap will not grace – or clog up – Metulla's Olympic-sized hockey rink next year. In a move that was not a total surprise, hockey has been removed from the list of sports at next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

The great Canadian game is one of 15 sports that have been eliminated from the 2001 Games. Rowing, sailing and masters track and field events have also been cut from the Maccabiah agenda, said Allen Gerskup, chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee.

Gerskup cited several reasons for hockey's Maccabiah demise: the uncertainty of icing a required fourth team to join Canada, the United States and Israel in the competition; the isolated location of Metulla, home of Israel's only large hockey rink and scene of the1997 competition; and the cost of sending a team.

Gerskup pointed out that for each sport to be accepted by the Maccabi World Union (MWU), at least four countries must participate. At the last Games in 1997, Ukraine also iced a team, but it was heavily subsidized by Canadian and American benefactors.

Gerskup said Maccabi Canada officials would rather see scarce resources going to subsidizing Canadian athletes.

The second factor, Metulla's location on the northern border with Lebanon, left the hockey athletes isolated and miles away from other Maccabiah-related events in central Israel, Gerskup said.

Hockey was introduced to the Maccabiah Games in 1997 and Canada, fortified by a roster that included pros, junior and college players, steamrolled the opposition en route to a gold medal. Without question, Canada's top athletes at the Games were hockey players.

Gerskup didn't rule out hockey's return to the Maccabiah in future years.

Cost and off-the-beaten-track locations were also factors in eliminating rowing and sailing, Gerskup said.

In other developments, Gerskup announced that Canada will be sending five junior teams to the Games for the first time ever: a boys baseball team; boys and girls basketball teams; and boys and girls soccer teams.

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

We Hurt the Ones We Love the Most

A friend told me the following story. As a young Jewish woman, she lived with her family in Vancouver. When she was in her early 20s, she dated a would-be musician.

The two adored each other and it seemed only a matter of time before their relationship would grow into a lifelong commitment.

Then, suddenly, their union began to founder for no apparent reason. For years she wondered what caused their relationship to evaporate so quickly and so mysteriously.

My friend went on with her life, eventually married another, and gave birth to four children. But she always remembered the first and purest love of her life. And she continually wondered to herself, "What went wrong?"

Years later she found her answer. Her former companion, now a moderately successful musician, was on tour and his band stopped in Vancouver.

A quick phone call and a date for coffee was arranged. In the middle of exchanging pleasantries and "catching up," my friend interrupted with the question that had bothered her for so long: "What really happened to us?"

He replied: "You deserve to know. Do you remember the time we visited your parents' ski chalet in the mountains? Your father took me for a walk one afternoon.

"On the path in the forest, he said to me: 'You know I love my daughter very much.'

" 'So do I,' I said.

" 'And you know I would do all in my power to protect her from anything that was bad for her.'

"And I said 'So would I.'

"And then your father said: 'Well, you are bad for my daughter. I don't approve of you for her.'

"And that was it. You see, I knew how much you loved your father. And I simply could not come between the two of you. So I let you slip away."

My friend was aghast. "So you two men, the people who were the closest to me, made a decision that would affect my life so profoundly, and didn't even let me in on it. How could you have let that happen? I had no say!"

Time was fleeting, and the musician had to run to a rehearsal. The two made plans to meet again in the next week, to continue where they had left off. But he never followed up.

Months later, through a friend, came the following message. "To see you again would have been too painful. You were the one true love of my life. And I simply cannot interrupt your life now, because of the mistake I made so many years ago. To see you, and not be with you all the time, well…I just couldn't."

My friend concluded with these words, "I understand why it was so difficult for him to see me again, as it was for me to see him. Whenever I was with him, a light was kindled inside of me. I never felt this way with anyone, and haven't since.

"And yet," she continued, "through force of circumstance, the well-meaning but misguided intervention of my father, and the lack of courage in my partner, it was all not to be."

We all want the best for the people closest to us. Yet, if we honestly care for them, we must grant them enough latitude and respect to make the decisions that will affect their lives the most.

Otherwise, we risk robbing them of lifelong happiness, even as we try to ensure their well-being.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I am an overweight 26-year-old professional woman.

I always dread the Jewish holidays because that's when I see my whole family and that's when they get to watch me eat. During these holidays, someone has always taken me aside "for my own good" to tell me I should lose weight. What do they think – maybe I haven't noticed that I am obese? Do they think they have made a great discovery that will change my life? I am angry and resentful that I can't have a comfortable time with my family like everyone else. I feel like calling in sick at every family get-together.

The more they harp, the more depressed I feel, which usually triggers more eating. What should I do about this?

Hate Weight Talk

Dear Hate Weight Talk,

I understand you are in an uncomfortable position. You want to spend time with your family on holidays, but they make you feel uncomfortable when you do.

You need to feel good about yourself. You can't let them do this to you. Family and holidays are too important too miss. It can't and never will be easy to hear them advise you about weight because you hear it as a put-down and they mean it as goodwill. I know this makes no difference to you, but you have to understand it's said with good intentions.

I suggest two things. First of all, you have to feel good about yourself, whether that means seeking professional help or just buying a new outfit. The better you feel, the harder it will be for someone to put you in that place you hate going to.

Second, stop them in their tracks as soon as they start. You can say, "I know you mean well Auntie So-and-so, but I'd rather not discuss this please," and then move on to talk to someone else. Hopefully they will get the message. It may take a few tries, but eventually, if they have no audience, they will stop talking.

Enjoy your life and do what you want to do when you want to do it.

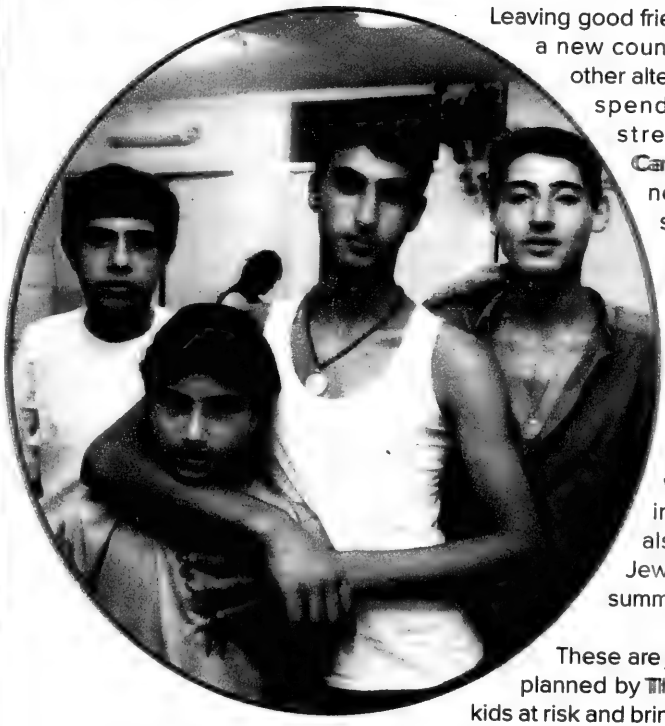
Where Young Newcomers Find Friendship



Leaving good friends and familiar surroundings behind for a new country can be a tough transition. Without other alternatives, it's easy for young immigrants to spend their free time hanging out on the street. Through the UJA FEDERATION Campaign For Our Children young Jewish newcomers will discover healthy friendships and positive programs instead.

The Campaign For Our Children is a special initiative to raise $45 million – four million more than last year – with additional donations designated to welcome kids from other countries into our community. With your increased contribution, we can hire more youth workers to connect with immigrant teens in their own neighbourhoods. We can also develop popular programming with Jewish content after school and during the summer.

These are just some of more than a dozen projects planned by The Campaign For Our Children to help kids at risk and bring them closer to Jewish life.

The Campaign For Our Children. Because your reasons for giving are growing.

Chrétien mends fences

Sets up direct consultation

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Joseph Wilder

Canada's much-criticized support of the United Nations resolution that condemned Israel for "excessive use of force" against Palestinians has resulted in a first: Prime Minister Jean Chrétien has established a direct pipeline between his office and the Jewish community in an effort to head off future flare-ups.

The historic move will allow Jewish leaders to consult directly with the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) instead of the Department of Foreign Affairs.

The CJN learned last week that Chrétien appointed his chief foreign policy adviser, Claude Laverdure, as liaison between the PMO and Canadian Jewish leadership, namely, the Canada-Israel Committee.

The move came during a 45-minute fence-mending session last Tuesday between the prime minister and leaders of Canada's main Jewish organizations, who hastily requested the hearing to voice their anger over Ottawa's support for the Oct. 7 UN Security Council resolution that condemned Israel.

The initiative may already be paying off. Late last week, there were two more UN votes condemning Israel. In one, held before

IDF fears Arafat is pushing for war

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The defence establishment is becoming increasingly convinced that Yasser Arafat does not intend to return to the Oslo process. This leaves him with two choices: The first, and the one he apparently prefers at the moment, is controlled violence that will lead in the end to new diplomatic initiatives, but with increased international involvement. The second, which Arafat has not ruled out, is a full-scale regional war.

The hope that Arafat would act forcefully to stop the violence has been exposed as delusional. The populace is pushing him to continue the "Al Aksa Intifadah."

Analysis

He has not yet sent a clear message of commitment to the Sharm understandings, contenting himself with ambiguous and non-binding statements through the Palestinian media. And serious incidents continue to occur.

Furthermore, some of the most dangerous Hamas activists are still not back in Palestinian Authority prisons. IDF officers say that "lifting the closure on the territories at this point would be tantamount to madness," given the intelligence information regarding plans to carry out bomb attacks in major urban centres.

Nor is it only Islamic radicals who pose a concern. According to the IDF, many of the latest incidents involved members of Mohammed Dahlan's preventive security apparatus, and both Dahlan and his counterpart

CANADA

Name Change

TORONTO — After 53 years, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews has decided to change its name to the Canadian Council to Promote Equality and Respect. The organization says the new name will more accurately reflect its inclusiveness and work to achieve a prejudice-free Canada.

ISRAEL

Most Want Talks

JERUSALEM — Most Israelis believe they have no peace partner, but still want to continue peace talks with the Palestinians, according to a poll released last Friday by the Israeli daily Ma'ariv. About 70 percent of the poll's respondents said they supported a national emergency government and are dissatisfied with the way Prime Minister Ehud Barak has handled the crisis.

Counselling Available

JERUSALEM — Counsellors in Israel are launching new programs for residents of Jewish communities in the West Bank and Gaza Strip who have been exhibiting heightened levels of stress during the recent violence. In addition, hotlines to help parents deal with children's fears have been set up in the West Bank and Gaza, as well as in Jerusalem.

Ethiopian Aliyah

JERUSALEM — Estimated Ethiopian aliyah for this year has been increased from 1,300 to at least 3,000, and current planning calls for an additional 5,000 Ethiopian immigrant arrivals for 2001, says the Jewish Agency for Israel. The agency's revised estimate is based on increased efficiency in processing by Israel's interior ministry, combined with the agency's upgrading of logistical support in Addis Ababa and Gondar.

WORLD

Deportations Marked

ROME — A stone plaque was unveiled here in memory of Rome's Jews deported by the Nazis on Oct. 16, 1943. Mayor Francesco Rutelli joined about 50 Jews, including Holocaust survivors, at the city's Tiburtina train station, site of the deportations.

London Attacks

LONDON — An Orthodox Jew was in serious but stable condition after being stabbed aboard a London bus last week in an incident police are treating as racially motivated. A 27-year-old man is in custody, police said. In another development, Jewish leaders in Britain said Islamic militants there should be prosecuted for distributing leaflets calling for the death of Jews. The Board of Deputies of British Jews said the militants distributed anti-Semitic leaflets in London, Manchester and Birmingham in response to the ongoing violence in the Middle East. "The final hour will not come until the Muslims kill the Jews," one leaflet said.

Shul Set Afire

PARIS — The door of a synagogue in southern France was doused with gasoline and set afire last week. The flames were quickly contained and damage was minimal. The Oct. 11 attack was the latest in a series of similar incidents, most of which have taken place around Paris.

Arrests Made

NEW YORK — Police have filed hate crimes charges against three Arab Americans in connection with vandalism against a synagogue in the Bronx. The three men are accused of throwing a bottle of vodka and breaking a window at Synagogue Adath Israel last Sunday.

Hakafot of Peace

NEW YORK — United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism has called on member congregations to express their support for peace in the Middle East over the weekend by dedicating the seven Simchat Torah Hakafot to peace. Readings and songs of peace have been provided by the organization.

Judgment Upheld

WASHINGTON — A U.S. appeal court has upheld a lower court decision stripping Algimantis Dailide, 79, of his citizenship for participating in the persecution of Jews in wartime Lithuania. Dailide,who resides in Gulfport, Fla., was a member of the Lithuanian Security Police (Saugumas) in Vilnius from 1941-44. The appeal court found Dailide participated in the arrest and search of Jews attempting to flee Vilnius and that some of those he arrested, including children, were to be shot at Paneriai, a wooded area near Vilnius.

Farrakhan, Again

NEW YORK — Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan repeated his charge that Democratic vice-presidential candidate Joseph Lieberman is more faithful to Israel than the United States. Farrakhan, who summoned supporters around the country to Washington last Monday for his Million Family March, also repeated on NBC's Meet the Press that Jews control black artists, athletes and the media.

World Summit of Jewish Leaders Proposed

JERUSALEM — A summit of Jewish leaders from around the world should take place in Israel within the next few weeks, the chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, Ronald Lauder, proposed last Wednesday.

Lauder said that such a conference would be a fitting response to the Arab League summit that was scheduled to take place in Cairo this past weekend.

He presented his proposal at a press conference held here by the Conference of Presidents, the United Jewish Communities and Keren Hayesod. The leaders of the organizations were all in Israel to show support for the country.

Lauder said he has discussed his idea with government representatives, and hopes to hold the summit within two weeks.

Several speakers at the press conference noted that this was the first time attacks on Israel have been accompanied by widespread attacks on Jews and Jewish institutions throughout the world.

Last Sunday, another solidarity mission of Jewish leaders from around the world arrived, this one led by Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress.

Milo makes Israel's case to Chrétien

By JANICE ARNOLD and PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporters

Israeli cabinet minister Roni Milo met last week with Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and later appeared eager to smooth over any impression of a rift with Canada over its vote at the United Nations condemning Israel for using excessive force against Palestinians.

Instead, Milo expressed Israel's appreciation for Chrétien's offer to use his influence with the presidents of Lebanon and Syria to secure the release of three Israeli soldiers held hostage in Lebanon by Hezbollah.

Milo, Israel's health minister, was acting as Prime Minister Ehud Barak's special envoy to Canada on the current Middle East crisis. In addition to Chrétien, he also met with Lloyd Axworthy, who was foreign affairs minister, as well as Defence Minister Art Eggleton, Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan and members of the parliamentary foreign affairs committee.

"It was a very interesting and positive meeting. We are not very happy with the unbalanced vote at the UN Security Council, but we still express appreciation for the very positive attitude," said Milo.

"The prime minister and foreign minister were understanding of the situation. They support us going forward in the peace process."

In Toronto later, Milo told dozens of Jewish community leaders that he felt Chrétien came away from the meeting with a greater understanding of Israel's position, particularly its view that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat fomented the recent violence for political aims, and that Likud leader Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount was merely the pretext for the violence.

"If Arafat wants to go to the Temple Mount, he could do it. [Senior PA official] Faisal Husseini was there already," he said.

Milo said the international media has distorted the reality of the situation and "when we explained the facts as they are, things become different.

"Canada is not a big power, but it's an important state," he said. Milo called on Canadian Jewry to use its influence with the government to make Israel's case.

Where is the outrage?

From the editor's desk

The Middle East violence of the last month has thrown the Jewish community into a state of shock. We are shocked for a number of reasons:

• The dismal, disconcerting realization that the so-called moderate leader of the PLO is neither moderate nor in the truly historic sense, a leader; the possibility of a peace treaty with the Palestinians seems now so horribly remote.

• The violence has evoked demonstrations throughout the Arab world – on the streets, in the mosques and through the airwaves – of the crudest, vilest forms of brazen, bloodcurdling anti-Semitic hatred. The scenes could hardly leap more frightfully out of a nightmare from the Dark Ages; but they are actually happening in the year 2000, a distressing, dissonant punctuation to the beginning of the 21st century.

• Yet, these shameless demonstrations have been virtually ignored by the western media. By and large, the West's reaction to this harrowing hysteria of hate has been SILENCE.

The cumulative impact of these phenomena has engendered the shock we feel today. With that shock, however, there is also bitterness, resentment and anger.

The West, including our government, saw fit to condemn Israel for "excessive use of force." Israel has been vilified by virtually every local print and electronic media outlet. But why has there been no outcry concerning the very public calls reverberating every day in Arab capitals to murder Israelis and Jews?

Why does our government not condemn the genocidal incitements of the mullahs?

Why do the television networks remain indifferent to the frenzied, almost gleeful exhortations to kill Jews?

In his bold criticism of his own government's support on Oct. 7 of the nasty, anti-Israel Security Council resolution, Irwin Cotler listed a series of proofs of the resolution's abject, blatant hostility towards Israel.

One of those proofs was the total absence of any mention in the resolution of the "standing Palestinian incitement to hatred and violence against Israel and Jews in the state-controlled television, radio, newspapers and children's textbooks."

Cotler correctly pointed out "This teaching of contempt, this demonizing of the other, this is where it all begins."

The "demonizing" has picked up in pace.

It is not only the standard practice of the Palestine Authority, it is the order of the day across the sands and the deserts of the entire Middle East and even beyond.

The following are excerpts from a sermon delivered Friday, Oct. 13, in the Zayed bin Sultan Aal Nahyan mosque in Gaza. It was broadcast live on the official Palestinian Authority television. The speaker was Dr. Ahmad Abu Halabiya, a member of the PA-appointed "Fatwa Council" and former acting rector of the Islamic University in Gaza.

The speech was reproduced by the IDF. I publish merely a handful of excerpts. It is an ugly screed against the Jewish people. Unfortunately, it is not an exception. But far worse, it is an exhortation by a public "religious" authority; it is part of a theological instruction; and it is part of pattern repeated by like-minded "religious authorities."

For readers, especially young readers, unused to hearing or reading examples of such unashamed, naked hatred, be warned. What follows is extreme and extremely alarming.

"The Jews are Jews, whether Labour or Likud. They do not have any moderates or any advocates of peace. They are all liars. They all want to distort truth, but we are in possession of the truth.

"O brother believers, the criminals, the terrorists are the Jews…They are the ones who must be butchered and killed…

"Even if an agreement of Gaza is signed – we shall not forget Haifa, and Acre, and the Galilee, and Jaffa, and the Triangle and the Negev, and the rest of our cities and villages. It is only a matter of time. The weak will not remain forever weak, and the strong will not remain forever strong. If we are weak today, and we are not able to regain our rights, then at least we have to pass on the banner – waving high – to our children and grandchildren.

"Have no mercy on the Jews, no matter where they are, in any country. Fight them, wherever you are. Wherever you meet them, kill them. Wherever you are, kill those Jews and those Americans who are like them – and those who stand by them – they are all in one trench, against the Arabs and the Muslims – because they established Israel here, in the beating heart of the Arab world, in Palestine. They created it to be the outpost of their civilization – and the vanguard of their army, and to be the sword of the West and the crusaders, hanging over the necks of the monotheists, the Muslims in these lands. They wanted the Jews to be their spearhead.

"We will not give up a single grain of soil of Palestine, from Haifa, and Jaffa, and Acre, and Mulabbas [Petah Tikva] and Salamah, and Majdal [Ashkelon], and all the land, and Gaza, and the West Bank."

Where is the outrage?

Montreal students send pro-Israel message at rally

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish students sent a clear message to their Palestinian counterparts at a rally last week: The inciteful messages spreading like a fire-storm across Montreal campuses in recent weeks will not by even one iota shake Jewish solidarity with Israel.

"We are sending a strong message that incitement to violence must end," McGill student Tobi Liebman told the crowd.

Violence, she said, is a "solution to nothing."

The massive show of support at McGill University appeared to signal a new impetus by Jewish students who have felt frustrated in trying to counter the onslaught of what they see as highly inflammatory anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic messages and rhetoric since the extreme violence erupted in the Middle East several weeks ago.

Organized primarily by the Hillel Jewish Students Centre, the rally was probably the largest held by Jewish students since the Soviet Jewry demonstrations of the 1970s and 1980s. Participants waved hundreds of real and computer-generated Israeli flags.

The rally became subdued, however, when speakers lamented the deaths of all victims, and there was a minute of total silence to remember the dead.

No Palestinian students interfered with the rally, but security was tight.

Police in riot gear stood by in case of trouble, and Palestinian students erected a display table just inside McGill's William Shatner union building as ralliers gathered outside.

Small, letter-sized signs held by the Jewish students had slogans such as "Proud to be a Zionist," "Am Yisrael Chai," and "Arafat Stop the Violence."

Despite the rally's peaceful nature, after it was over, Jewish students who entered the union building engaged in verbal clashes with the Palestinian students before being dispersed by building officials.

Outside, earlier, the rally, which drew more than 1,000 Jewish students from university, CEGEP and high school campuses across the city, saw speakers unite in one voice in decrying violence and rhetoric that equates the Star of David with the Nazi swastika, mourning all the victims, vowing Jewish solidarity with Israel and calling for a real dialogue with Palestinians.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko of the Beth Israel Beth Aaron synagogue drew the loudest cheers when he told the crowd that Jewish students have finally been galvanized into action.

"It may take us a few days to react," he said, "but when we do wake up and raise our voices, nothing can stop us!"

From the speakers' platform, located by chance just outside the locked doors of the Islamic Studies Library, Rabbi Poupko referred to the torching of Israeli flags during local recent Palestinian rallies.

"No one will burn a flag or declare a holy war here," he said. "We call not for death, we call for life. We call not for war, we call for peace."

Andrew Elbaz, former president of Hillel City-Wide and a law student at the Université de Montréal, bluntly termed the UN Security Council resolution that condemned Israel "filth."

The resolution ignored Palestinian desecration of Jewish holy sites and the fact that the Temple Mount is also holy to Jews, he said.

Still, Elbaz called for a "mutual and creative rapprochement" that would allow real and peaceful dialogue to take place among students.

Arié Lévy, of the francophone Centre Hillel, pleaded for the "facts" to come out, and urged people not to believe media reports such as one he saw in a popular French-language daily, Le Journal de Montréal.

He said nothing has changed on the Israeli-Palestinian peace front since the Oslo accords in 1993, because "nothing has changed in the attitude of the Palestinians.

"Israel doesn't want war, but it will never tolerate violence," he said.

The students' concerns about anti-Israel messages could be seen the Friday evening prior to the rally, when the Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights group sponsored an appearance at Concordia University of former U.S. congressman Paul Findley, a strident anti-Zionist.

The event was denounced by B'nai Brith League for Human Rights national president Stephen Scheinberg and Quebec chair Allen Adel as highly inappropriate and provocative.

Crisis in Israel

Israel needs the right type of friends

By GIL TROY
Special to The CJN

Just after Rosh Hashanah, the world was repelled by the heartbreaking picture of a 12-year-old Palestinian boy dying in a crossfire as his father vainly tried to shield him. Many Jews, too, were justifiably upset – only the coldest of people, the most hawkish of hawks, could fail to be saddened by such a tragedy.

Guest Voice

Too many Jews, however, joined the world in turning on the Jewish state itself. Understandably repulsed by the young boy's brutal death, these fair-weather friends broadly condemned the army, the political leadership, and the entire state. Many spoke of being "embarrassed" to be a Jew. Rather than repudiating the action, they repudiated the State of Israel entirely – often without really understanding the complexities of life in the Middle East.

Just after Yom Kippur, the world was repelled by the heartbreaking picture of a Palestinian mob beating and mutilating disarmed Israeli army reservists. Now, many Jews who heretofore had been uncomfortable, or ambivalent about Israel, rallied around their besieged homeland. Federations mobilized. E-mails flew. Protesters rallied. In Israel, and throughout the Diaspora, our often unruly, quarrelsome, cranky people found a unity last experienced when Iraqi Scuds rained down on Tel Aviv nearly 10 years ago.

Right now, and as long as this awful crisis continues, Israel needs all the friends it can get. The first United Nations Security Council Resolution in response to the crisis made this perfectly clear. With most of the countries of the world, including Canada, ganging up on Israel, this is no time to be picky. It is hard to believe that Canada and the other nations did not feel moved to condemn the orchestration of violence in violation of the Oslo peace process, the desecration of a holy site, Joseph's Tomb, the manipulation of world opinion by deploying schoolchildren to fight. Still, under such circumstances, the Jewish people's relative unity is most welcomed – and absolutely necessary.

But given that most of us, luxuriating in the comforts of Canada, are not consumed by the crisis round-the-clock, it is worth assessing the peculiar psychology of our people. Somehow, we do seem to generate more fair-weather friends than most. I do not recall many Canadian Jews, no matter how much they hated Brian Mulroney, rethinking their basic allegiance to Canada at the time. I do not recall many American Jews, no matter how much they hated Ronald Reagan, ever reassessing their love for America. Yet, somehow, many of us, especially our youth, do not feel that Jewish connection, that Israel connection, as deeply. Ahavat Yisrael, a love for Israel, does not come as naturally to your average young Canadian Jew, as does loyalty to Canada.

The tenuousness of that Israel connection partially reflects the voluntary, and expendable nature of Jewish identity in the modern world. Anyone of us can give it up. We are extraordinarily free in 21st-century North America. We are free to change our names, our noses, our nationality. We are free to adopt all kinds of identities, to assume all kinds of poses, in this stunning and eclectic marketplace of personae we are lucky enough to inhabit.

More and more sophisticated studies are indeed showing that Jewish identity in this modern world is not only voluntary but fluid. It waxes and wanes over the course of a lifetime. Jewish involvement intensifies when many become parents, or when many enter their golden years, just as it flags during the increasingly prolonged adolescence many young North Americans enjoy.

The malleability of Jewish identity, however, is only part of the problem. The other cause of this fair-weather friendship may have to do with the opposite phenomenon, the foul-weather friendship. Our Jewish community is great about rallying around Israel during times of crisis. It is, of course, natural to close ranks when attacked, to rise to the challenge during stressful times. Moreover, conditioned by millennia of anti-Semitism, and with the Holocaust looming ever larger in the contemporary Jewish psyche, we Jews are conditioned to coalesce and mobilize under the gun.

Alas, such "reactionary activism," as one friend calls it, comes at a price. Foul-weather friends beget fair-weather friends by obscuring the real reasons for a friendship. Foul-weather friends and fair-weather friends both make what should be a three-dimensional relationship unidimensional. If the foul-weather friends rally to the cry "My country right or wrong, take it or leave it," the fair-weather friends simply leave it.

Such an all or nothing approach to our Jewish homeland is most unfortunate. Many of Israel's most articulate and cutting critics are Israelis themselves. They understand that criticism can also be an expression of love, that they can fight fiercely for their state's right to exist, even as they fight fiercely against one policy or another, one tactic or another. The fair-weather friend simply walks away; the foul-weather friend, when mobilized, blasts the Israeli internal critic as a traitor too, perpetuating a stereotype of our community as closed and narrow-minded.

Israel's short life has been punctuated by so many crises that too many of us do not know how to love Israel, to appreciate the miracle of our Jewish state, when things are calm. We are blind to the many wonders of this remarkable country. A month ago, federation fund-raisers knew that Israel didn't "sell" with most donors, that things over there were at once too quiet and too complex.

Shockingly, my FEDERATION CJA pledge card lists eight different and worthy areas for the Directed Plus Giving Program. The only one that mentions Israel talks about Rescuing Jews for resettlement in Israel – and my guess is that most of that money would be spent in Russia, Ethiopia, or wherever else. Now, of course, one crisis and too many deaths later, Israel is again serving as a galvanizing force.

We need, when the smoke clears, to reevaluate our relationship to Israel. We need to forge strong and deep ties that last. We need to fall in love with Israel, the success story, as well as Israel the beleaguered, Israel the proud partner not just Israel the poor cousin.

We need to see what we can get from our relationship with the Jewish state – a sense of history, an exposure to all kinds of Jewish expressions, a feeling of belonging – rather than simply seeing what we can give to the Jewish state in trouble.

Let us pray for peace. And let us pray for the opportunity to test out an all-season friendship with the Jewish state, a friendship based on mutuality and equality that can survive the good times as well as the bad.

Toronto students rally in support of Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A recent York University rally in support of Israel was cut short when a student of Arab descent accused a speaker of expressing hatred towards the Palestinians.

Questions were stopped by moderator Darren Kleinberg, director of education at Jewish Campus Services, after the student shouted that Col. Yaen Vered, a shaliach for the Jewish National Fund, was breeding hate.

Vered replied that because he said the Palestinians used guerrilla tactics, does not mean he hates them. "I did not say hate. I said that we are in a situation in which we have to do whatever we can."

Other speakers at the rally included Zahavit Ben Hillel, vice-consul to the Israeli Consulate and Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy and Israel Affairs at Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region, who also spoke to students at University of Toronto the next day.

Ben Hillel, who said that the rally made her feel at home after being away from Israel for three months, said that to achieve peace, Israel needs security. "That is why we have been negotiating with Palestinians for seven years; we need to be assured of our surroundings.

"Israel has been attacked and it had to respond. It had to defend itself in order to keep alive. This is not excessive power, it is self defence," she said.

She urged students to stand beside Israel in support of its policies. "Your goal as future Jewish leaders is to stand by our side. Write letters to the editor, express your opinions, and join a program that is going to Israel. Show your support – not just mentally, but physically.

"We will achieve peace. The goal is there, and we will reach it," she said.

Rosenblum shared remarks made by Canadian Jewish Congress at the recent community rally held at the Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto Synagogue. He said that as long as the world is able to justify Palestinian violence to the point of blaming Israel for shooting back, Palestinians do not have a reason to stop the violence.

"Whether the world likes it or not, Israel will defend itself. The reality of a news photo is different than the reality of an Israeli soldier being attacked.

"[Yasser] Arafat must do what he has failed to do. He must withdraw his forces, and see that all those associated with him halt all inflammatory statements."

Vered said that students need to take part in the war. "You are soldiers just like we are. You have to know where you stand.

"You all have computers. Look into the real world and read all the newspapers. The facts are easy to get. Learn the facts, and discuss whatever you can. Otherwise the war is lost. We cannot afford to create a division of information," said Vered.

Two boys assaulted in Montreal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada's Quebec region office has fielded about a dozen calls reporting local anti-Israel or anti-Semitic incidents in the wake of the ongoing Middle East turmoil, regional director Robert Libman said.

But only one of them, a report about two Jewish boys wearing kippot who were assaulted at a Métro station, was "fairly serious," he said.

The rest were the type of events "that usually accompany tensions in the Middle East," said Libman, co-chair along with Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region officer Rabbi Reuben Poupko, of the Jewish community's Security Co-ordinating Committee.

Libman said most incidents were "not of an overly serious nature."

He said they included a swastika daubing, an individual being accosted near the Beth Ora Synagogue in St. Laurent and a menacing phone call to the city's Hechal Shalom Synagogue.

At the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, Libman said, about 25 Palestinians began to demonstrate but were dispersed by police. In the most serious incident, Libman said, a Jewish student wearing a kippah was "whacked with a belt" at a Métro station and was being lifted over a railing when another group of young men came to his aid.

A few minutes later, another Jewish young man – also wearing a kippah – was assaulted in the same station, presumably by the same individuals who beat the first boy.

JVS hopes to avert strike with mediation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Employees of Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) may go on strike as early as the end of this month, pending mediation.

Wages and Jewish holidays are among the key issues to be discussed, when union employee representatives and a team of JVS management staff and board members meet with a mediator from the Ministry of Labour on Oct. 26.

The 80 employees, representing just over half of JVS' 150 staffers, are members of CUPE Local 2137 and provide job counselling, educational and vocational services to Jewish and non-Jewish clients.

Staff salaries were frozen from 1992 to 1997, when a 1.75 percent increase was negotiated, said Tia De Agazio, CUPE Local 2137 president and an employment consultant with JVS' youth program.

"Some staff are making up to $20,000 less than their counterparts in similar agencies," she stated in a news release.

She also noted that more than 50 staff have left the agency in the last two years, "because they were fed up with being treated like second-class employees."

In a phone interview, De Agazio also mentioned a high staff to management ratio. "They keep saying there's no money for raises, and they keep hiring more union-exempt people," she said.

Karen Goldenberg, JVS executive director, disputes the charges. In a phone interview, she noted that:

• JVS salaries fall into the top 33 percent of social service agencies providing employment and career services in the Greater Toronto Area. Salaries may be different in the private sector.

• Since 1991, JVS salary costs, including bonuses and economic adjustments, have increased by more than 23 percent per employee.

• She does not feel JVS has a problem with retention or attrition. "We consider our turnover to be less than the norm and have many long-standing employees," she said.

• The hiring of non-union employees was "about the need to have adequate supervision" to keep up with growth of agency programs and revenue base. Some of the new managers had been promoted from union positions.

Under a collective agreement between CUPE and JVS, which expired March 31 and is still in force until negotiations are complete, both Jewish and non-Jewish employees are entitled to up to 13 days off per year, with pay, should the Jewish holidays fall on weekdays.

Goldenberg said the agency would continue to "respect everyone's time off for religious observances," but would not pay for the days off.

The agency is about to see "a major shrinkage" when a $1-million grant from Ontario's Ministry of Community & Social Services in April is replaced by a fee-for-service payment system, said Goldenberg.

"We're very hopeful we'll come up with a settlement," said Karen Goldenberg. "That's our hope and our goal."

There have not been strikes at JVS in the past, she said. "We have come very close, and always settled."

While JVS' success is based on the success of its employees, "we can only work with what we've got," said agency president Mickey Milner. "We've got to be more entrepreneurial."

To the polls, Canadians

Canadians will vote for a new federal government on Monday, Nov. 27. The campaign rhetoric has already begun. In truth, it began, understandably, some months ago when the official Opposition selected its new leader. But Canadian voters are sophisticated enough and more than just a bit experienced in the ways of politicians to separate rhetoric from substance.

It is vital that as many eligible voters as possible actually go to the polls on election day and cast their ballots. The right for all citizens to choose who will govern us is the chief hallmark of our democratic way of life. It is the ideological and functional underpinning of our free enterprise market system. It is the guarantor of our freedoms. And it is the most hallowed and most cherished of all the distinguishing features that differentiate our society and civilization from those of the despots, dictators, tyrants and military strongmen.

There are three issues of particular interest and relevance to the Jewish community that should be placed before the competing parties during the campaign: Canada's voting record at the United Nations on matters relating to Israel's security; the pursuit of Nazi war criminals living in Canada; and the federal government's indecision or stated inability regarding the government of Ontario's refusal to end its state-sanctioned discrimination in its educational funding policies. But, it must be stressed, we should not look at these as "Jewish issues." They are issues of essential, core Canadian values. As such, they compel the Canadian conscience and demand attention by the wider Canadian public

Indeed, there are never "Jewish issues," per se, in a general election.

Every issue that touches upon good government is a "Jewish issue." Achieving the very best government possible is the highest priority for every eligible Jewish Canadian voter just as it is the highest priority for every other eligible Canadian voter.

Thus, the issues that the voters must put before the parties, the leaders and the candidates before we can decide in whom to place our trust to form the "very best government possible" are the same for all of us, regardless of region or religion.Those issue relate to:

- Social policy – ensuring the best health, welfare, educational and environmental programs possible; providing humane and sensible immigration and refugee policies;
- Fiscal policy – finding the right balance to enable the funding of the desired social policies while constantly reducing the cumulative debt, establishing fair taxation policies and encouraging ongoing investment through appropriate incentives;
- Constitutional policy – erecting a bulwark against the dismemberment of the country within the framework of the Supreme Court's decision on the legality of a unilateral declaration of independence by Quebec.

Canadians know the issues. On Nov. 27 we will decide who should be entrusted to try to deal with them.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Understanding the happiness I felt

As the festival of Sukkot approached, I wondered how I was going to be happy on this holiday: hundreds of people had been killed or injured, our three soldiers were still missing, tension was mounting by the day and peace seemed so far away.

But immediately after Yom Kippur, sukkot began sprouting up everywhere. The smell of bitterly sweet etrogim permeated the streets. The roads were lined with people dragging home the palm branches for their sukkah rooftops and children carrying home ornaments they had made in gan (nursery) that morning. Witnessing this, I began to understand how one could be happy on this holiday.

Although there was a hint of sadness in everyone's preparations, people still eagerly prepared for the holiday. The shuk (market) was surrounded by police and soldiers, but the merchants were as festive as ever wishing their customers a Shanah Tovah filled with peace and happiness. I witnessed countless people approaching soldiers and buying them drinks, offering them holiday sweets and thanking them for protecting our country.

Where do we find happiness amid such insecurity, tragedy and destruction? Simply in the Jewish people. We have often been described as am Yisrael chai, the nation that lives. Our happiness is based in our intrinsic nature as Jews to be a nation of life, of celebration and pride. Young and old, oleh chadash (new immigrant) and chalutz (pioneer), the whole country is celebrating right now, albeit with fear and anxiety, yet their sukkot are all standing tall.

Even though the news may be upsetting, I won't change my feelings of pride and dignity in being a Jew. I won't alter my views as a Zionist and there is no way I will lessen my love for our homeland.

Although the situation is very grave and although our people seem to be threatened throughout the world, I must say how proud I am to be a Jew living today, in this day and age.

How much happiness it brought me to see Jerusalem filled with the sukkot; how much joy I felt when I heard Chag Samayach wishes being exchanged from the bus driver to his passengers; how much unity I felt with and among our brethren that we were all – religious and non-religious – celebrating this holiday, just because we are Jews.

Clinton cannot deliver peace

Benjamin Netanyahu was right all along. When he came to power he demanded reciprocity. You want something, give something. You made a promise, keep it. The U.S. pressure on him was enormous. Bill Clinton forced Netanyahu to give it up. He also supported Ehud Barak in the Israeli election.

Now the illusion can no longer be maintained. Peace Now and its illusion is dead. May it rest in peace.

Clinton bears a special responsibility to acknowledge he was wrong and that he can't deliver. He should place the blame where it belongs and not force Israel to disregard reality. He should apologize to Israel for abstaining on the recent UN resolution in the false hope that it would reduce the violence. The beast cannot be appeased.

It is time for the United States to support the hardliners who have been proven right.

There will be no hope for true lasting peace until the Arabs in general and the Palestinians in particular stop preaching hatred of Israel and the Jews in the kindergartens, in the schools and in the media. Only if this practice is followed for two or three generations will there be a hope for real peace.

Goldstein reinforces sages' wisdom

I commend you, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, (CJN, Letters to Editor, Oct. 12*)* for pointing out the inappropriateness of referring to a woman's physical appearance ("curvaceous") in an article by Sheldon Kirshner describing her spiritual capabilities as a cantor.

Your comments underscored the wisdom of our sages regarding women assuming public positions of leadership, such as rabbi, cantor and the like. While it is inappropriate for a journalist to describe a female cantor's attractive physique, how ridiculously inappropriate for a male worshipper – striving for spiritual transcendence – to be thinking likewise about his rabbi or cantor, during services.

Furthermore, though perhaps we can educate individuals to write or speak correctly (as you attempt to do with your letter of reproof), we cannot stop human beings from thinking naturally. Nevertheless, this is not meant to exclude women from meaningful participation within Judaism.

As the dean of a young woman's seminary, a frequent speaker to women's groups across North America and the author of two books on women in Judaism, I, too, consider myself a "spiritual leader." My flock, however, are my female students and audiences. I choose to limit my sphere of influence over the male populace to my writing and books.

And I thank you for reminding me, once again, exactly why I make such decisions.

A conflict not of territory, but of religion

By ELISHA HAAS
Special to The CJN

For the sake of peace, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak last year offered President Hafez al-Assad of Syria more than he could have previously dreamt. He offered him the whole of the Golan Heights and almost all the territory of Israel that Syria occupied before 1967, without a commitment to full peace. Assad turned it down.

This summer at Camp David, Barak offered Yasser Arafat most of Judea and Samaria, including vital security zones in the Jordan Valley and Judean Desert. He was willing to give Arafat half of the old city of Jerusalem,including the surface of the Temple Mount. This was an offer he should not have refused.

But like Assad, Arafat did refuse.

Last week Arafat launched a war. The control of recent events by Chairman Arafat and the Palestinian Authority is irrefutable. The current violence is not a spontaneous eruption. It was prepared and planned long ago. Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount was an excuse, not a cause.

Why? Why was it impossible to convince Assad to sign such a generous deal? Why does Arafat answer Barak's offers of peace and compromise with a war that he did not initiate when former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu refused to give him much less?

The answer is that both Assad and Arafat had long-range goals that go far beyond the question of the territories captured in 1967. They did and do not seek peace with Israel. The long-range goal is to eliminate the Jewish state and make the Jews an oppressed minority under Muslim rule in the holy land, just as they used to be in Islamic countries for centuries.

The "territories for peace" concept of Oslo never had a chance to succeed. It appeared to work only as long as the PLO was collecting property without any commitment for peace. Now that Barak demands a "declaration of end of violence" in response to a massive Israeli withdrawal, it is the end of the Oslo game.

The Israelis who went to Oslo and followed the Oslo path, and the U.S. administrations that tried to make capital by bringing the parties to ceremonies on the lawn at the White House and invested huge efforts in Camp David, ignored a very basic fact: The conflict is not over territories, it is a conflict between religions.

The Muslims will not accept an independent Jewish state in the holy land. They will tolerate it as long as they do not have the option to destroy it. Their position is not contingent upon signed agreements. Arafat has repeatedly and openly explained to his followers that the agreements he has signed are like the Hudeiba agreement of the prophet Muhammad and the Jews of Kurayesh (622 AD), which was a peace agreement that the prophet ignored when he felt strong enough to kill the Jews.

Arafat thinks that Israel is now weak, and will soon be destroyed in a war. It may take 10 or 15 years, so why sign now? Moreover, the withdrawal of Israel Defence Forces from Lebanon, which is viewed as a defeat of Israel by an Islamic force, caused Arafat to seek his own victory in a battle, just like the Hezbollah of Lebanon. That is why he did not sign the draft offered him in Camp David.

There is now no occupation of Lebanon by Israel. Yet, every day Arabs from all over the world gather at the Israel-Lebanon border and stone Israeli soldiers. Even the renowned Prof. Edward Sa'id of Columbia University came from New York to the Lebanese side of the border at Metulla and was photographed throwing stones at an IDF position on the other side of the border. This is a small example that shows that the conflict of the Middle East is not territorial.

There is only one course of action that has a reasonable chance of bringing about the coexistence of Israel and the Arab states, including a Palestinian Arab state.

Israel should decide for itself what are the essential territories that will enable it to survive isolated in the Islamic Middle East. If it will then annex those areas and declare that the borders so established are not negotiable, and over which it is willing to fight for its survival, then there is a much higher chance for peaceful coexistence, so long as the Arabs believe that Israel is indeed strong, and is indeed willing to defend itself on those borders.

I believe three areas are essential for the security of the State of Israel: the Golan Heights, the Jordan Valley, the Judean Desert, the southern desert (Negev) and the extended Jerusalem area. (Labour party leaders prior to Shimon Peres and Ehud Barak held the same belief.) These areas form what we call the Eastern Column.

It is possible to accommodate a Palestinian Arab State in the West Bank and Gaza only if the Eastern Column remains under the permanent control and full sovereignty of Israel.

This territorial solution, and its backing by Israeli determination and the ability to defend it by itself, will lead to de facto peaceful coexistence and economic co-operation. As it looks now, there is no way to establish peace by an agreement, but there is no need for an agreement, which is meaningless in any event because every agreement with the Arabs is a Kurayesh type agreement. It should and could be implemented by Israel unilaterally, for the benefit of the Palestinian people (not for the benefit of the PLO leaders) and Israel.

The problem is that Barak and Clinton are following the concept of Oslo, in which the signature of an agreement is the prime goal.

The whole concept of the Oslo process has finally collapsed. It was based on the assumptions that peace can be purchased by delivery of territories, and by appeasing the terrorists by "confidence building steps" (a nice word for unilateral concessions).

It is now clear that this policy is just like pouring gasoline on a flame.

The current violence was prepared and planned long ago. It has nothing to do with Sharon's visit at the Temple Mount.

Mohammed al-Durra, the 12-year-old who was killed in Gaza, and around whom much of the international media's campaign against Israel originally galvanized, had travelled three miles from his home to the place where he was killed in order to throw stones at IDF soldiers. His father followed him and knew the goal of his young son's walk.

Palestinian youngsters, known as Fatah Children, receive an education, but is it the kind of education that can lead to tolerance and understanding? [RNS/Reuters photo]

What reasonable parent would let his or her child take part in such stone fighting? What reasonable parent would let his or her child take part in such stone fighting so far away from home?

The PLO gunmen were shooting from two positions 10 metres from the 12-year-old. They refused to halt fire to let the father and son get out of the fire trap because they needed the "full show." They, therefore kept the production on the stage for a long time and succeeded in moving their audience.

The entire episode reminded me of the many "false-plots" and libelous accusations over the past 1,600 years about Jews killing young children.

Arafat is not alone in his plans. Egypt and Jordan have peace treaties with Israel, but lead violent propaganda campaigns against the Jewish state. Both of them support Arafat's declared positions. And Egypt prepares for war against Israel.

Assad refused to play that game altogether; he did not agree to take the Golan for a signature on a peace treaty. They all are preparing for the big battle of the Muslims against the Jews. Salah a Din, the hero who won the battle with the Crusaders and restored Muslim regime in the Holy Land 700 years ago is the model of their joint national aspirations. They are waiting for the opportunity, when the Jewish state would seem to be weak, tired, and dependent on the protection of foreign forces.

The Oslo process plays to their hands. The plan I suggest does not. It is possible to implement it. Most important, our western friends should stop pushing the Oslo type solutions and should not lure Arafat to put on his "peace mask" and sign a volatile treaty.

Arafat's true face should be visible. It was a mistake to force him to "cancel" the PLO Covenant two years ago. He remained the same Arafat, the treaty is in effect, he is making progress along its lines towards the destruction of Israel. Israel lost major portions of land and received a nice photo of Clinton in Gaza.

Unlike Barak, who talks about an end to the conflict, I believe we should learn to live with the conflict, but retain conditions that would reduce the temptation by the PLO to violate the peaceful conditions. I am certain this is the only practical way and that will lead to coexistence, as we can see all over the country in micro scale.

A major problem is that the western world cannot or does not undefstand the rules of the game of the Middle East. A worse problem is that most Israelis are part of the western world.

It is dangerous. Very dangerous.

Postscript: Since this article was written, there have been many developments that fit the view presented here:

- Joseph's Tomb in Nablus was destroyed and a mosque is reportedly being built on site.
- The ancient synagogue in Jericho was burned and Arafat police forces did not let the firefighters get to the site.
- The public lynching in Ramallah of two Jews, was aided, if not conducted by the "police" forces of Chairman Arafat.

The virtual peace of the Oslo process evaporated in one day. There was never a peace process, there was a "political" process of unilateral Israeli concessions and an illusion of peace.

The contribution of the western world to the "momentum" of that virtual process reduced the prospects of non-virtual coexistence here, similar to Neville Chamberlain's contribution to the eruption of the World War II. In the cultural environment of the middle east the word "peace" is used in a very distorted way.

When Mr. Trudeau read Psalm 86

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

My personal memories of Pierre Elliott Trudeau cover a number of years and occasions. It was the time when I frequently had to defend Canadian Jewish interests, and many were my opportunities to meet and discuss policy with him, especially when they related to Israel and Canada's varying relationship with it.

When I look back, one event stands out. It was 1976, and the Olympic Games were about to begin in Montreal. Four years had passed since that dreadful night in Munich when 11 Israeli athletes were slain. The Jewish community decided that a special memorial service was necessary to set the tone for the Games.

The Olympic committee turned down such an observance, and it was left to us to remind the world of what had taken place in 1972. Under the leadership of Thomas Hecht, a committee was formed to plan a service at Montreal's Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue, and I was asked to conduct the service and deliver the sermon.

I called Trudeau, suggested that it would be important for him to participate and requested him to read a psalm of his choice. He agreed quite readily.

When I arrived at the synagogue, it was evident that something very special was afoot. Security precautions were enormous. Armed sharpshooters had taken up positions on the surrounding rooftops. A helicopter hovered overhead. The stream of people wanting to attend seemed endless, and in the end 5,000 people were accommodated in the synagogue sanctuary and other halls of the shul where video reception was arranged.

The crowd hushed when the Israeli Olympians marched in, followed by the relatives of the slain athletes. The simple service created a cadence of mounting emotion. Trudeau rose, came to the bimah and faced the assembly. The cameras were whirring. (Twenty-two national and international networks were filming the service.)

Trudeau had chosen Psalm 86, emphasizing these lines: "O God, arrogant men have risen against me; A band of ruthless men seeking my life; They are not mindful of You…"

He read the psalm in French and his words had a musical lilt. As he spoke, there was not a dry eye amongst those present, and his own tears were evident as well. I myself thought I could not go on, but somehow pulled through. The memorial prayer by the chazzan provided a sombre finale to an hour that none of us would ever forget. I like to think that we saved the moral stature of the Games.

It is also well to remember that it was Pierre Trudeau who appointed Bora Laskin, a member of Holy Blossom Temple, as chief justice of Canada's Supreme Court. The honour accorded Laskin reflected back on the exceptional former prime minister whom we buried recently.

Kadosh an emotional experience

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Our children asked us to see the Israeli movie Kadosh with them. We had an intimation that we were in for an emotional experience when we met friends who had already seen the movie.

Reactions? "It was difficult for me to watch this – I had a hard time looking at the screen," the husband told us, a man who is sensitive and kind, with children and grandchildren.

The setting is unrelentingly claustrophobic, a haredi community with couples living in tiny rooms furnished only with twin beds and a wardrobe.

The central figures are Rivka and Myer, a loving couple whose childless marriage is about to be sundered by the demand for children.

The study-house is tiny and cramped, filled with men and the colliding needs of the rebbe (the father of Myer) and his son, who loves his barren wife, but is about to be drowned in his father's demand for children.

Meyer and his wife have a deep, sensitive love, a passionate and caring relationship, accepting of the confines of their community.

Yet Myer is being forced to divorce his wife because, as his father-rebbe reads the Torah, he informs his son that he is obliged to take a new wife because he has gone 10 years without children.

Meanwhile, Rivka visits a doctor outside the confines of the enclave, who tells her that the fault is with the husband and that there is help, if only the couple will avail themselves of it.

And here is the first tragedy – Rivka cannot ask her husband to get this medical help, because as a devout man he would refuse to undergo the necessary procedures for determining the efficacy of his sperm.

Not only is the geography of her life constricted, but her emotional space is hemmed in by the very belief system which she continues to honour.

She is sent away and a new wife found. "We are here to bring children into the world to fight against the others," the father-rebbe sternly instructs his pliant, suffering son.

Rivka has a sister. She is married to a man whose mental state approaches hysteria, and who is abusive and loutish in his behaviour. Her true love has already fled the confines of the kollel and is forbidden to her.

The culmination of the sisters' two lives is tragic for both. Rivka – she who was to be sent away – apparently never gets very far, for her broken husband appears in a drunken state to lie at her feet, while she has ceased to speak at all.

Her sister eventually runs away from her husband and, by implication, her religion, to join her first love outside the walls of the sect.

Our friends were right – it is very hard to watch this movie, as the lives of the protagonists unravel.

We leave the theatre in a state of shock. "The thing was about children," my husband points out, "but there were no children in the story at all."

He's right. Except for a few young boys in the background, the streets were empty. We see no home filled with the hearty tumult of children.

The tragedy for me was that the holiness of a loving relationship was not considered enough. And until the end, the central figures are faithful to their religion and community, until that community destroys both Rivka and Myer.

It nearly engulfs Rivka's sister and crushes their mother. The movie could have been called Betrayal, because all those things that the individuals believed in and held sacred (kadosh) were the very ideals that destroyed them.

How to step back from the abyss of despair? A survivor once told me, "We believed that if we were good, God would protect us."

He ended up in the Pripet marshes, fighting with partisans who had given up the idea of God's protection. Only years later did he find his way back to God.

What could I tell my children about this film? Do not let your insistence on what you think our tradition tells you be the instrument of harm to another human being. That would be the opposite of kadosh.

Sukkot despair

Bruce Elman in Windsor

I have always loved Sukkot. To me, it is a wonderful, joyous holiday. When one thinks of festive holidays, one usually has Chanukah or Purim in mind. Not me, I love Sukkot. I adore the symbolism of Sukkot, and particularly the tremendous hopefulness it engenders.

Right after the conclusion of the Yom Kippur fast, we begin building our sukkah. In Israel, where unlike Edmonton, it is warm enough to leave one's windows open in October, you can hear the hammering as your neighbours begin to construct their sukkot.

My wife designed and built a brilliant sukkah which fits perfectly with our house in Edmonton, where my family is still living for the time being. Even though I am not particularly handy around the house, I do enjoy helping her put up the sukkah. In Israel, one can expect to eat all of one's meals in the sukkah. By contrast, in Edmonton, one never knows when it will be too cold or snowy to eat in the sukkah. In some perverse way, this, too, adds to the joy of Sukkot.

Once the construction is finished, the decorating begins. At one time, our family actually used to make our decorations. Now that our children are older, however, consumerism has taken over and we purchase our decorations. (As my father-in-law says, "Everyone has to make a living.")

Then, of course, there is the acquiring and maintaining of the lulav and etrog and all of the other accouterments. Every year, I have to re-educate myself on the proper method of setting up the lulav, the exact way to make the blessing, when precisely you shake the lulav during the Hallel prayer and the order of directions in which to wave it. All of the minutiae fascinate me.

There are also wonderful parties that attempt to bring back the great ecstasy of the simchah beit shoevah – the water ceremony – and the great symbolism of walking around the synagogue, lulav and etrog in hand, reciting the Hoshanah prayers. And of course, it all concludes with the Hakafot and the singing and dancing of Simchat Torah (even though this, technically, is a separate holiday)!

The problem is that, of late, I have begun to associate Sukkot with great sadness. On our first sabbatical in Jerusalem in 1988-89, the intifadah had broken out and this put a damper on the festivities of Sukkot.

We were again on study leave in Israel in 1995-96 – known in our family as the year of the bus bombings – and the great joy of Sukkot was once again suppressed. In that year, however, greater sadness was yet to come. Just after Sukkot concluded, Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated. This was one of the most traumatic communal events I have ever witnessed. It deeply affected our family as it did scores of others. I will, forever, associate Sukkot with Rabin's murder.

Nothing, however, compares to the sadness I have experienced this Sukkot while watching from afar the events unfolding in Israel. The mounting violence and the rising death toll have deeply affected many people, myself included. For me, neither the intifadah nor the bus bombings nor Rabin's assassination caused as great a sense of loss and despair as have these latest events.

Indeed, I have come to the point over the past few weeks where I cannot watch the television pictures any more. The scenes of children caught in crossfires, of ancient holy sites burned and demolished, of reservists being lynched and their bodies mutilated are simply too painful.

I have tried to analyze why I have reacted so strongly to these events. At first, I thought it was because peace seemed so close at hand only a few months ago. I had thought that perhaps the concessions made by Prime Minister Ehud Barak would be the basis for a comprehensive peace settlement, but now, the escalating violence seems to have set the peace process back immeasurably or destroyed it altogether.

I realize, however, that my despair is the result of a different, more devastating conclusion: I have lost all hope that peace can ever be achieved. I am no longer just saddened by these events – I have sunk from sadness to despair. Regrettably, this is how I will always remember this Sukkot.

The Kirshner File

Al Gore, George Bush race to the finish line

As the U.S. presidential campaign heads into the homestretch before the Nov. 7 election, the outcome is far from certain. This is the tightest race since 1960, when the candidates were John Kennedy and Richard Nixon. Democrat Al Gore and Republican George Bush are running virtually neck and neck. The fringe candidates, Ralph Nader of the Green party and Patrick Buchanan of the Reform party, are essentially spoilers in what is basically a two-party political system.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In terms of experience, competence and a grasp of the issues, Gore, the vice-president, stands heads and shoulders above Bush, the governor of Texas. Yet the presumption of a Gore victory cannot be assumed.

Bush, whose quest for the presidency would have been inconceivable without family connections, launched his campaign around the theme of "character." His working assumption was that he could defeat Gore on the basis of an amiable personality and a pledge to bring "dignity and honour" back to the White House after the Monica Lewinsky sex scandal. But about two months ago, worried by a steady erosion of support, Bush shifted tactics and began concentrating on the issues rather than on Gore's supposed lack of credibility as a person. Bush also tacked to the centre, stressing his "compassionate conservatism" and highlighting his commitment to social justice, inclusion and diversity after four egregious lapses of judgment early in the race.

He visited Bob Jones University in South Carolina without denouncing what had been its ban on interracial dating and its hostility to Roman Catholicism. He sided with dyed-in-the-wool conservatives by supporting South Carolina's right to fly the Confederate flag – a symbol of segregation and racism – on the grounds of the state capitol. He asked Patrick Buchanan, a nativist who has issued subliminally provocative statements about Jews, to remain in the Republican party when other Republicans were demanding his ouster. He refused to meet Log Cabin Republicans, a gay group that his rival, John McCain, had met.

Clearly concerned that these immoderate positions would alienate swing voters, Bush turned contrite and said, "I reject bigotry." Meanwhile, the Republican platform categorically rejects "racism, anti-Semitism, ethnic prejudice and religious intolerance."

Bush, nevertheless, is campaigning on a right-of-centre, socially conservative ticket on the key issues: tax cuts, abortion, school vouchers and prayer, gun control, the environment, Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security. On these issues, Gore has staked out a staunchly centrist, socially liberal stance designed to appeal to progressive middle-class voters.

On Middle Eastern policy questions, Bush and Gore espouse virtually identical positions.

The Republican platform sets out four priorities for the Middle East – the promotion and maintenance of peace in the region; the safeguarding of Israel's security; the reliable flow of Persian Gulf oil; and the reduction of the threat posed by Iraq's and Iran's weapons of mass destruction.

Bush, having made his first and only visit to Israel in 1998, describes Israel as a "friend." He has declared that "a safe and secure Israel is in our national strategic interests;" that the United States should not "dictate solutions" to the Israeli government in the peace process; that Washington should eventually move its embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Asked during the first television debate when the United States should deploy forces abroad, Bush cited three circumstances, including a situation when "our friends in the Middle East are threatened."

The Democratic plank on Middle East issues states: "Al Gore and the Democratic party are fundamentally committed to the security of our ally, Israel, and the creation of a comprehensive, just, and lasting peace between Israel and its neighbours."

The platform states that the United States will always ensure that Israel retains a "qualitative military edge" over its Arab adversaries. It also recognizes Jerusalem as Israel's undivided capital.

Gore, having compiled a solid pro-Israel record as a congressman, senator and vice-president, believes that American ties with the Jewish state transcend day-to-day issues. As he put it during the second TV debate: "Our bonds with Israel are larger than agreements or disagreements on some details of diplomatic initiatives."

In accordance with President Bill Clinton's policy, he has said he will delay transferring the U.S. embassy to Jerusalem until after an Israeli/Palestinian peace agreement.

Like Bush, Gore supports United Nations sanctions against Iraq, and rarely misses an opportunity to remind voters that he and his vice-presidential running mate, Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, were among only 10 Democratic senators to support the 1991 Gulf War.

Gore's bold and historic selection of Lieberman, the first Jew on a major national ticket, has brought him benefits in the form of a revitalized campaign. A crowd pleaser who conveys moral authority, Lieberman has generally impressed voters with a folksy demeanour and middle-of-the-road views on affirmative action, military spending and school vouchers.

"Lieberman has looked like a bundle of energy in comparison with the leaden presence of Dick Cheney, the former secretary of defence, on the Republican ticket," Howell Raines of The New York Times wrote recently. In his estimation, Lieberman, an observant Jew, has drawn the positive attention of religiously conservative Christians who flocked to the Republicans and stayed there. As he observed: "...many fundamentalist and evangelical Protestants and culturally conservative Catholics are more attracted by Lieberman's devoutness than they are put off by doctrinal differences between Christianity and Judaism."

Lieberman, however, has not been immune from criticism. He has been lambasted for attacking violence and vulgarity in popular culture, yet muting his disapproval of Hollywood movies so as not to alienate prominent Democratic supporters in the film industry.

Dick Cheney and George Bush

Some Jews have expressed discomfort with Lieberman's emphasis on the importance of religion in public life. The Anti-Defamation League chided him over this issue.

Lieberman, too, has raised eyebrows for being receptive to meeting with Louis Farrakhan, the Nation of Islam leader who has been condemned as a Jew-baiter.

Dick Cheney's social conservatism does not appeal to most Jews, but his generally pro-Israel record has not gone unnoticed.

Although he supported U.S. arms sales to Arab states and has been critical of specific Israeli policies, such as the 1982 invasion of Lebanon and Israel's recruitment of imprisoned spy Jonathan Pollard, Cheney was in the forefront of upgrading the United States' military and strategic relations with Israel in the wake of the Gulf War. In addition, he backed the joint American-Israeli Arrow missile defence system and publicly thanked Israel for destroying Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981.

With the election less than two week away, Gore and Bush find themselves in a statistical dead heat. As a result, they plan to run hard in swing states – Florida, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Michigan, among others – where Jewish voters can make a difference.

Bush, however, cannot count on the Jewish electorate for support. Historically, most Jews have voted for the Democrats.

Dreyfus Affair chronicled in U of T exhibit

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Dreyfus Affair still resonates, 106 years after it insinuated itself into fin de siècle France like an oozing sore.

Brutally exposing the fault lines and prejudices of French society, and prompting the Viennese journalist Theodor Herzl to embrace and promote Zionism, it was a momentous and defining event that seems remarkably fresh today.

An exhibition on the affair, Dreyfus and Zola: A Moment in the Conscience of the World, is now on at the University of Toronto's Art Centre, 15 King's College Circle.

Running until Dec. 9, the exhibit, on loan from the Beitler Family Foundation in the United States, tells the story through the medium of newspaper headlines, lithographs, posters, postcards, letters and books. A video puts it all into perspective.

In 1894, Alfred Dreyfus, an artillery captain and the first and only Jew on the general staff, was accused of having passed military secrets to Germany. Charged with treason, sentenced to life imprisonment and stripped of his rank in a degrading ceremony in the courtyard of the École Militaire in Paris, he was deported to Devil's Island, a miserable compound off the coast of French Guyana.

The charge against Dreyfus, an assimilated Jew and an ardent patriot, was spearheaded by Edouard Drumont, the fiercely anti-Semitic editor of La Libre Parole, a man who prided himself on being "the pope of anti-Semitism." Joining him in this reactionary crusade was a motley array of monarchists, army officers and conservative Catholics.

Throughout the ordeal, Dreyfus, supported by an alliance of high-minded socialists, liberals and republicans, maintained his innocence and loyalty to France.

Emile Zola, France's most renowned novelist, took up his cause. In a famous article in L'Aurore headlined J'Accuse...!, Zola condemned this monstrous miscarriage of justice and called for a public trial.

Amid mounting frenzy, a new court martial took place in 1899. Dreyfus was found guilty, but with "extenuating circumstances," and sentenced to 10 further years of detention.

Among the most striking artifacts are the original front pages of the newspapers that attacked or defended Dreyfus – from La Libre Parole to Le Petit Parisien.

The front-page headline of The Graphic (1899) touches a chord as well. It reads: "Dreyfus the Martyr."

Also quite riveting is the facsimile of Zola's J'Accuse manuscript, published by L'Aurore on Jan. 13, 1898.

The Dreyfus affair unleashed a wave of latent anti-Semitism, and the lithographs reflect the racist temper of the times.

In one such series, Dreyfus, branded as a traitor and an enemy, is alternately portrayed as a serpent and a coiled octopus on whose head is inscribed the word Talmud, while Jews are depicted as baboons.

There are posters aplenty, most sympathetic to his cause. One, published by the Hebrew Publishing Company in New York City in 1899, advertises a musical score for piano and violin dedicated to Dreyfus. Two movie posters sell the virtues of Devil's Island and I Accuse, starring Jose Ferrer as Dreyfus.

In addition, a set of 15 postcards, a collection of books about Dreyfus' ordeal and a letter from a concerned Alabama senator are on display.

Alfred Dreyfus is disgraced.

This is the gripping stuff of history.

Local choir to sing in Nuremberg

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They are being billed as concerts to heal old, festering wounds.

Next month, in the German city of Nuremberg, a cradle of Nazism during the Third Reich, a Toronto Jewish choir will join six other choirs from the United States and Israel in concerts designed to foster reconciliation between Jews and Germans.

The international musical encounter, which will coincide with the opening of a new museum chronicling events in Nuremberg during the Nazi period from 1933 to 1945, is called Sounds of Healing.

The performances, which will mark the city's 950th anniversary and the 62nd anniversary of Kristallnacht, will take place in a theatre near a stadium where Nazi rallies were regularly held.

Lachan, the Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, will join the Nuremberg Symphonic Orchestra in a performance of Leonard Bernstein's Kaddish Symphony No. 3 on Nov. 25 and Nov. 26.

Lachan, in conjunction with the American and Israeli choirs, will also put on a joint concert for Nuremberg's resurrected Jewish community.

This concert will feature music written by five Jewish composers: Srul Irving Glick, Ben Steinberg, Sid Robinovitch, Louis Applebaum and Yefim Adler.

Sounds of Healing was conceived as both a cross-cultural artistic collaboration and a mission of reconciliation, said Lachan's conductor, Cantor Benjamin Maissner.

"The performance of Kaddish – the title is associated with the Jewish prayer for the dead – represents an occasion in which Germans and Jews can remember in musical prayer their combined and troubled history, and move on to a new era," he added.

Founded in 1993, Lachan is a 24-voice choir which specializes in Canadian-Jewish repertoire. Its name is taken from one of the Hebrew words for melody. Many of its singers are children of Holocaust survivors and new Canadians.

The American choirs are the Los Angeles Zimriyah Chorale, the Choral Society of Southern California, the Beverly Hills Presbyterian Church Chancel Choir and the El Camino Real High School Camerata.

The choirs from Israel are the Tel Aviv Chamber Choir and the Efroni Children's Choir.

Helena Fine, a member of Lachan, said it was invited to take part in Sounds of Healing following a concert at a recent cantors' assembly in Detroit.

In Canada, Sounds of Healing has been endorsed by several organizations and four rabbis.

The organizations are: Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, Canadian Jewish Congress – Ontario Region, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Council for Christians and Jews.

The rabbis who have lent their names to it are Erwin Schild of Adath Israel Congregation, Dov Marmur and Gunther Plaut of Holy Blossom Temple and Moshe Shulman of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

In addition, Sounds of Healing is supported by the consulates of Germany and Israel and the Canadian German Chamber of Industry and Commerce Inc.

Holy Blossom Temple plans a farewell reception for Lachan on Tuesday, Nov. 7, from 6:30 to 8 p.m.

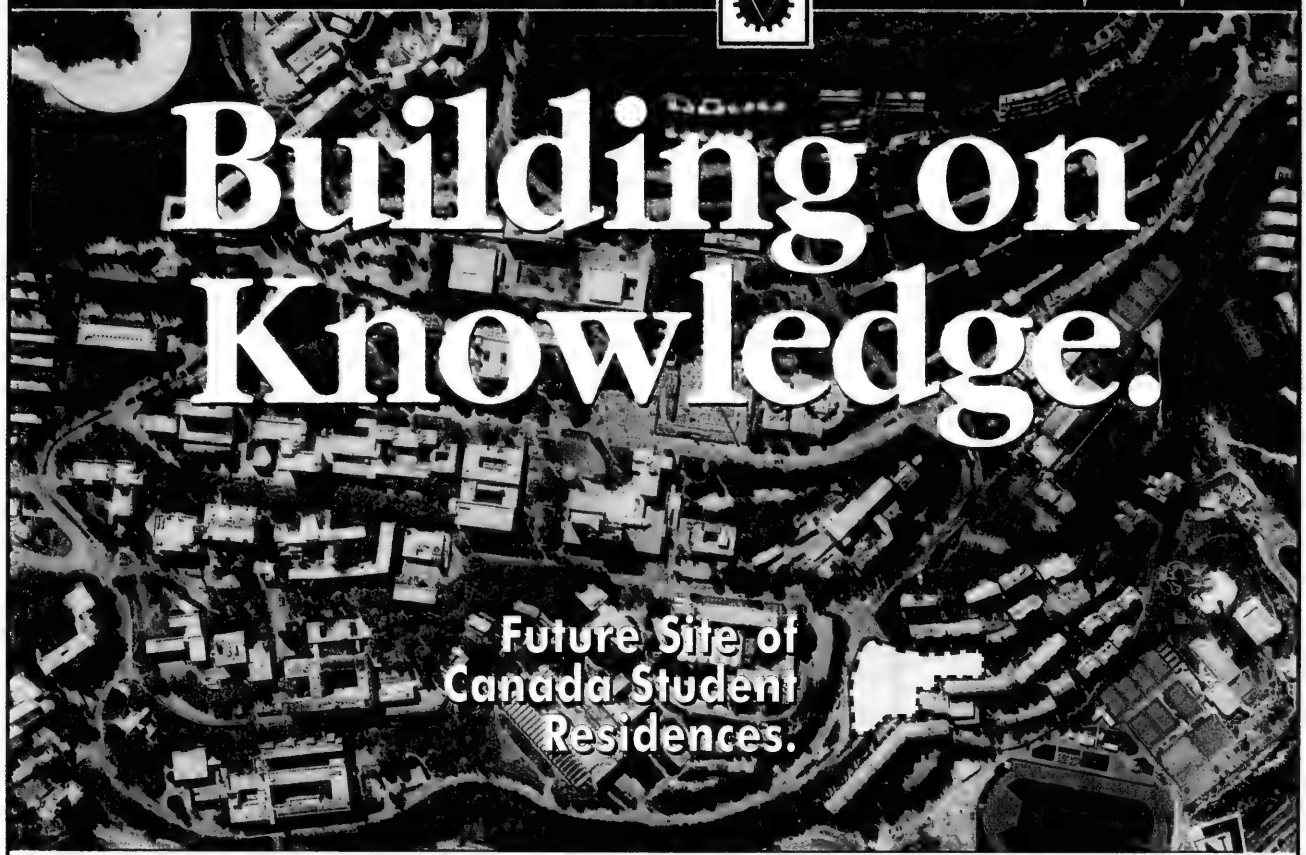
Building on Knowledge.



CRISIS: There are not enough Israeli engineers and scientists to support Israel's burgeoning high-tech economy. Israel cannot emerge as a world leader in science and technology without a steady flow of qualified home-grown engineers and scientists.

RESPONSE: In 1995, at the Israeli government's request, the Technion initiated a plan for a significant rise in student enrollment. The total student body has now reached an all-time high of 12,000.

PROBLEM: Currently, the Technion can offer on-campus dormitory space to only one out of every four students. All others must seek housing in Haifa or its outlying districts.

SOLUTION: The Canadian Technion Society has undertaken the building of the Canada Student Residences. This complex, composed of twin, ten-storey towers, will house 300 students in fully-equipped one-bedroom suites. The residences will be an important addition to the Technion campus. They will be located in the Canada Village, an area which proudly reflects the generosity of our Canadian supporters.

Havdallah and the story of creation

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

Rabbinic Reflections

We have the privilege this week to read the story of creation. The story of creation forms the basis of Kiddush on Friday night but in addition, it forms the basis of Havdalah which we make on Saturday night.

There are rules about Havdalah – you are not supposed to eat on Saturday night or do any work until after Havdalah has been made. Havdalah begins the weekday activities.

Rabbenu Bachya maintains that the first four verses of the Torah parallel the four brachot of Havdalah. The first four verses are: (1) God created the heavens and earth; (2) The spirit of God hovered over the waters; (3) God said; Let there be light; (4) God separated the light and the darkness.

The four brachot (blessings) of Havdalah are: (1) wine – God created the fruit of the vine, (2) spices, (3) candle, (4) havdalah – God separates between holy and profane.

Each of these brachot is a reflection of the themes of the four opening verses of the Torah: (1) wine – God created the fruit of the vine which reflects the creation of the world; (2) spices – the sense of smell is the Hebrew word reyach, paralleling the concept of ruach, spirit. The blessing over spices is rooted in the second verse that describes the ruach, the spirit of God hovering over the waters, (3) the candle is a parallel to the creation of light, and (4) havdalah is a parallel to the separation of light and darkness.

The basis then of Havdalah, according to Rabben Bachya is the creation of the world. Havdalah is not the conclusion of Shabbat, it is the introduction to the week.

Kiddush on Friday night is the introduction to Shabbat, the statement of the holiness of Shabbat. Havdalah is the introduction to the world of creativity, the world of the week.

The holiness of Shabbat needs an introduction, a statement from us of its holiness. In addition, our weekday activity is holy, creative work and it, too, needs an introduction through the medium of Havdalah.

Book fair appeals to variety of tastes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With thousands of books of Jewish interests, as well as tapes, videos and CD-ROMs, the 24th annual Jewish Book Fair, running Nov. 2 to 12, is certain to appeal to a diversity of tastes, says director Helen Redner.

A highlight of the fair that is expected to attract about 6,000 people to Leah Posluns Theatre, says Redner, is a talk by author Richard Newman, a London, Ont., journalist who, with Karen Kirtley, wrote Alma Rosé, Vienna to Auschwitz.

The book tells the true story of Alma Rosé, conductor of the woman's orchestra at Auschwitz, who died in April 1944. At its maximum, the orchestra had over 50 players.

For his research, Newman interviewed more than 100 people who were able to give firsthand information.

On the same program will be Martin Goldsmith, host of the radio program Performance Today, talking about his book The Inextinguishable Symphony. It is the story of his parents' involvement with the Jewish Kulturbund, "a little-known episode that created a haven for Jewish artists in the Third Reich," says Redner.

The program, with the theme of music, "is a departure from our usual programming. It should be fascinating," she says.

Opening night of the book fair features Rivka and Ben-Zion Dorfman who will present a slide show/lecture on their book Synagogues Without Jews and the Communities that Built and Used Them.

The Dorfmans, who have lectured throughout the United States and Israel, have spent years researching synagogue art and architecture in Italy, Austria, the Czech and Slovak Republics, Hungary, Croatia, Serbia and Greece.

Other programs include Mysteries of Love, featuring novelists Joy Fielding and Sylvia Maultash Warsh; a screening of the film The Assistant, based on the novel by Bernard Malamud and produced by Paul Brown; and the Shlomo Steinhardt Yiddish Lecture by Pierre Anctil, a francophone non-Jew who is fluent in Yiddish.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut will speak on his latest book The Price and Privilege of Growing Old, and two books written by his wife Elizabeth; and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, editor of the Women's Torah Commentary, will speak on New Insights from Women Rabbis on the 54 Weekly Torah Portions.

Also on the schedule are such authors as Dr. Jerald Bain, Franklin Białystok, David Matas and Erna Paris.

A school program for students in Grade 5 and older features a screening of the film Out of the Fire: the Faye Schulman Story, the story of a young woman who survived the mass murder of her family in 1942 because of her skills as a photographer.

Amnon Rubinstein, a member of the Knesset, and author of From Herzl to Rabin: The Changing Image of Zionism, was due to speak but he had to return to Israel due to the Middle East crisis, says Redner.

The fair comes together each year as the result of more than 150 volunteers "who do everything from book selection and inventory, to ticket selling and ushering, says Redner, the fair's only paid employee.

Jewish Life

Vegetarianism and kashrut

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The holidays are over. And we're stuffed. So what better time to look at food. The meatless kind.

If you're considering cutting down or cutting out meat in your diet while observing kashrut, there are many tips for you on the Jewish Internet.

How does Jewish vegetarianism differ from the standard kind? That question is addressed in If Lettuce is Lettuce, What is Jewish Vegetarianism? [http://www.micahbooks.com/letucediscuss.html].

Several Jewish sources are quoted for following a vegetarian way of life such as pikuach nefesh (the duty to guard one's health) and tsa'ar ba'alei chayim (the commandment not to cause sorrow to living creatures.)

Jews, of course, are allowed to eat meat. But this site points out that there are traditions that Adam and Eve were created as vegetarians and were only permitted to eat meat after leaving the Garden of Eden. And that in the Messianic period, the world will return to vegetarianism.

One of the most outspoken proponents on the Internet of a Jewish vegetarian lifestyle is Richard Schwartz. In Must We Be Veggies: The Case for Jewish Vegetarianism [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=962], Schwartz maintains the controversial point of view "that committed Jews are not only permitted but are obligated to be vegetarians." He also addresses the traditional rabbinical view that meat should be eaten at festive meals.

Similarly, Dr. Jay Lavine argues for a Jewish vegetarian ideal [http://members.aol.com/Sauromalus/jewishveg. htm]. (Always remember that you should consult a trusted rabbi for any halachic guidance.)

For another view on why someone chooses a kosher/organic way of life, see the links to Chayyim Pesach Silverman's articles, Ritually and Naturally Pure [http://www.jcn18.com/jewishfood/silver_1.htm] and Becoming Ritually Pure – the Manual [http://www.jcn18.com/jewishfood/silver_2.htm].

From vegetarians to vegans to fruitarians to pescetarians, the terms referring to what people choose not to eat can get confusing. Here's a good vegetarian glossary [http://www.veg.org/veg/FAQ/glossary.html].

Just because a product seems to be meat-free doesn't mean it's necessarily kosher. These days, unless you have a degree in advanced biochemistry, it can be daunting trying to understand the origin of the chemicals that go into our food. For example, you can go ahead and eat something with dilauryl thiodiproprionate. It's a synthetic preservative that doesn't require kashrut supervision. But watch out for alpha amylase. It's sometimes used in flour to break down starches and it comes from hog pancreas. For other ingredients and their uses see [http://www.kashrus.org/kosher/chem.html].

Two confusing ingredients for vegetarians who keep kosher are rennet and gelatin. Gelatin is a tasteless, odourless substance extracted by boiling bones, hoofs and other animal tissues [http://www.vegweb.com/glossary/docs/gelatin.shtml]. Some points of view maintain that since gelatin is so far removed from its original form, it does not need to be derived from a kosher animal. Orthodox certification requires it [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask127.htm#Q1].

Vegetarians should be aware that gelatin from kosher sources is considered pareve.

Rennet is a substance containing an enzyme used to coagulate milk and create cheese [http://www.vegsoc.org/info/cheese.html]. A common source of rennet is the stomach of slaughtered newly born calves although microbial enzymes are used in kosher cheeses. For a view on the use of kosher rennet, see [http://www.j51.com/~yspivak/spivak5.htm].

So far we've thought about food. We've reasoned about food. And we've looked at its ingredients. Next column, we eat.

An absorbing memoir

Typing — A Life in 26 Keys by Matt Cohen, Random House, $32.95

A few weeks after his 24th birthday, a surprised Matt Cohen was offered a teaching position at McMaster University. George Grant, with whom Cohen had become friendly at the University of Toronto, invited him to teach a course on the sociology of religion, a subject about which Cohen knew almost nothing.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Grant indicated, however, that there was a minor problem. "Matt would have to be screened by the dean of the department before the job was final. Grant explained: 'It's about your being Jewish; he doesn't like Jews. He'll hire you, but it would be a lot easier if you didn't talk about it.'"

In a surreal moment, like something out of a Woody Allen movie, "Matt looked down into his teacup and imagined himself in the dean's office, dressed up in his spiffy clothes and borrowed tie. 'Just a few weeks since Chanukah,' I might remark. 'Did you get anything good?' Or: 'I know this is supposed to be a job interview, but do you mind me asking if Baptists really believe all Jews go to Hell?'"

The author portrays Grant as generous, a brilliant conversationalist and a supreme realist. "He was the only man of his generation who combined the courage to look unflinchingly into the future and the intellectual power to clearly articulate his vision."

At the same time, he had the makings of a cult leader who demanded perfect faith and perfect fidelity. After a couple of months on the job – which only lasted about a year – Cohen decided that the main reason Grant had hired him was to provide him with "a conversational foil and amusement."

Cohen charts, in this absorbing memoir, his literary progress from early inchoate attempts to write at disreputable Rochdale, to the struggles, decisions and uncertainties involved in fashioning his many novels, to experiences with his publishers – especially Anna Porter and Jack McClelland at McClelland and Stewart.

The Spanish Doctor (1983), his most Jewish work, is an historical novel set during the cataclysmic dawning of the Renaissance. Avram Halevi, a crypto-Jew, the book's doctor protagonist, lives a tumultuous life from his conception in Toledo, Spain, to his death 76 years later in Kiev. The incarnation of multiple experiences, he emerges with his family from fire and fury to renewed faith in Judaism.

The novel, popular in the United States and England, didn't do well in Canada, where the literary critics, negative and intemperate, found it beyond their ken and understanding.

At the suggestion of Quill and Quire magazine, Cohen interviewed Margaret Laurence, who at the time was embroiled in a painful censorship battle over the teaching of her books in schools. Laurence, a devout and active Christian, was deeply hurt.

Over lunch, Cohen found it both sad and astonishing that what seemed like a minor conflict could take over and distort a talented writer's life. "By the time I left her house I felt as though I just witnessed a few hours in the martyrdom of someone whose only sin was to be a human being and have inner contradictions."

Incidentally, Laurence confided to Cohen that what she wrote was divinely inspired and that the voice she heard while writing was God's voice.

Cohen completed work on this memoir two weeks before his death at 57. What many literary critics considered his most mature and enduring novel, Elizabeth and After, won the Governor General's Award for Fiction in 1999.

Written in a direct conversational manner, filled with personal reflections, replete with anecdotes and vivid portraits, this affecting and honest work that covers three decades of Canadian cultural life should find an appreciative reading audience.

Diceman set to invade Canada

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Stuart Teperman has turned a rainy day activity into a game that should soon invade the country.

Teperman, 42, says the idea for Diceman, a brightly coloured game played with dice and a "diceman," was conceived after he gathered up a selection of games at the cottage and began to put various game pieces together.

"Most games have dice, and when I realized my kids loved a game with lots of them, I thought about developing a game that could incorporate that idea."

New board game

What evolved after several stages of development, was a game that comes complete with four dicemen (playing pieces), four sets of eight-coloured dice, and a game die. "The idea of the game is to defend off opponents with one hand, while the other hand rolls the game die to prepare an attack."

After having the game trademarked and copyrighted, he test marketed it at his children's school, and got "rave reviews. We had boys and girls of various ages play it and give us their opinion. From that, I knew I had a hit," says Teperman.

The trilingual game – English, French and Spanish – will soon be available at stores such as Toys R Us, Mastermind, Dufferin Games, and in Zeller's Club Z Catalogue. "I have some American orders as well, and a toy distributor in Europe has a licensing agreement to manufacture and distribute Diceman in three Scandinavian countries."

Diceman appeals to people of all ages and abilities, he says, because it is a "mix of luck and skill, and it moves quickly. You have to think, you have to roll the right number, and you have to do it in 20 minutes. It's a good combination."

Teperman, a Toronto native, says he is so delighted to the response to Diceman, that he is "giving back something to the kids of the city."

A portion of sales of his game is going to the Children's Breakfast Club, an organization that provides a hot meal for children who may otherwise go to school without breakfast.

A Diceman competition with up to 64 contestants, is planned for the end of the month. The winner will play Diceman with three local celebrities. For information or to have your name drawn to compete, fax Teperman at 905-761-6301, e-mail Gr8toys@hotmail.com, or write 114 Fernstaff Court, Concord L4K 3L9.

Ontario's Jewish jailer

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario's top jailer is governed by a Jewish concept of justice, found in Deuteronomy: "Justice, only justice shalt thou pursue, that thou mayst live, and inherit the land which the Lord thy God gives thee."

"I use that as my guiding principle," says Morris Zbar, who was recently promoted to deputy minister of correctional services – the highest bureaucrat in the ministry – and the person in charge of all the province's jails.

As deputy minister – or DM in bureaucratese – Zbar's task is an expansive one. On any given day in Ontario, there are 70,000 people under some form of supervision, whether it's in jail (sentences of two years less a day result in incarceration in provincial institutions); those remanded into custody or given conditional sentences; all parole cases; and all cases involving young offenders.

Zbar, 52, presides over Ontario's 47 jails, detention and correctional facilities; 40 probation and parole areas; and roughly 8,000 employees – all funded by $570 million a year.

It's also his job to be the chief liaison between his department and the government, helping to ensure that political visions – whatever form they take – are implemented.

Many who work in Toronto's Jewish community may remember Zbar as a vice-president of community planning and development with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (as it was called then), a post he held from 1994 to 1998.

But how did a good Jewish boy get into the bad guy business?

It was 1975, and Zbar had just returned from Africa, where he'd been doing research on local politics for a PhD from Hebrew University. "I was unemployed and looking for a job," he recalls. "So I answered an ad in the paper for a correctional officer. I had no idea that I was applying to be a prison guard."

Off he went to a maximum security prison in Ottawa. Despite a full-scale riot, "I found it fascinating. It was so totally far removed from the middle-class Jewish upbringing I had."

Morris Zbar

And he worked his way up, from guard to probation and parole officer, then as a manager, then as director of a ministry review. He also put in a stint at the ministry of culture and tourism.

He left to go to the Jewish federation, but returned as assistant deputy minister for community and young offender services.

Last year, the government of Premier Mike Harris split the solicitor general's department into two ministries, resulting in a freestanding correctional services ministry.

Zbar says Ontario's rate of incarceration has remained stable over the years. While Canada's overall rate is nearly twice that of Europe's, it's still seven times lower than the one in the United States.

As for recidivism, "it depends on whom you ask. It could be anywhere from 30 to 70 percent. The problem is that there are different definitions of a repeat offender. Is it a week after they are released? Six months? Five years?"

Currently, he's overseeing the construction of two new jails to replace deteriorating facilities in Penetanguishene and Lindsay.

Zbar was born in France to Polish parents who had survived the Holocaust. He was brought to Montreal at age two, and attended Outremont High School and McGill University.

He and his wife Margaret, a teacher, have two children, David, 28, and Ilana, 23.

Zbar doesn't hesitate to bring his Jewish values to the job.

"Society must have a system that is just, and appears to be just," he says. "Being Jewish gives me an advantage in trying to realize that."

CHATTING WITH THE MINISTER: Federal immigration and citizenship minister Elinor Caplan last week paid a visit to the newly opened Reena ElderHome, located in her riding of Thornhill. The facility will house 16 older residents. Caplan is seen chatting with ElderHome resident Kermit Parent.

Synagogue tribute planned

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Flo Urbach believes in giving back, in showing appreciation in a tangible way.

When her children were attending Jewish day schools, she spent countless hours working on their behalf.

But her main love is Kehillat Shaarei Torah, to which the Urbach family has belonged since the congregation's early days at Windfield Public School.

And she is being honoured by the synagogue for all her work, with a tribute dinner, to be held at the Wagman Centre on Nov. 25.

"Flo has led most fund-raising initiatives [of the shul]. In her quiet yet highly effective manner, she has endeared herself to our community and provided financial stability for the growth of the synagogue," Michelle Apple, the dinner co-chair, told The CJN.

A media release from the synagogue describes some of Urbach's many contributions, from shlepping the siddurim from location to location before the shul had a permanent home, to giving and helping find the first donations towards that home, to serving on the board of directors and the sisterhood, to washing the used tablecloths from the kiddushim – something she still does.

Her specialty, though is fund-raising. She runs the garage sales and raffles. She organizes bingos, originally at the nearby Peanut Plaza, and now at Steeles West Bingo Country at Dufferin Street and Steeles Avenue.

The success of Kehillat Shaarei Torah is "like a dream come true," she said. "I watched it grow when no one knew how it would grow."

When she and her family were looking for a synagogue to join near their Bayview and York Mills home, they were advised to check out the fledgling congregation, then under the leadership of Rabbi Eliot Feldman. They found a congregation with "a portable bimah, books in trunk, and a kiddush that members of the congregation made themselves every week."

It was "fantastic," she said of her first experience with the shul. "We loved the place. We got involved. And involved."

She felt a bond with the members of the congregation, many of whom are South African immigrants. "I understand them, because I am an immigrant too. I feel what they feel."

Urbach, then known as Farah David, was born in Baghdad. Her mother was the niece of the city's chief rabbi; her father was from Bombay.

When the Iraqi Arabs started harassing the Jews in the months before the establishment of the State of Israel, her father uprooted the family – her mother, two sisters and two brothers and Farah, who became known as Flo – and moved to London, England.

Life was not easy there, Urbach said. Iraqi Jews were unknown. "People didn't believe we were Jewish. We didn't know any Yiddish (or any English either, for that matter), and we looked different."

Her father had trouble adjusting to life in England, and when Urbach's siblings left for Israel, Australia, the United States and Canada, the family decided to join her sister in Sydney. On the way there, her father had a stroke and died.

Nevertheless, she spent five happy years in Sydney before deciding to explore the United States and Canada.

She stayed in Toronto for awhile, working as a pharmacist at the Toronto General Hospital, and she met Gerry Urbach, who was then doing research into ovarian cancer. It was love at first sight, Urbach said, which was lucky, as Gerry was heading for advanced study at Middlesex Hospital in England.

"We met Nov. 5 and married Dec. 27," she said, still a tad surprised after all these years at how quickly everything happened.

When they came back, Gerry Urbach set up a practice in obstetrics and gynecology. Flo concentrated on raising her family of four children.

With a twinkle, Flo stresses one thing about all the work she has done for Kehillat Shaarei Torah. "Don't kid yourself. I love it!"

For more information about the dinner, call Rachel Sochaczewski, shul administrator, 416-229-2600.

Kolel explores 12-step programs in new course

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning is offering a new course on the parallels between Judaism and 12-step programs.

Rabbi Neal Loevinger, head of Kolel's department of outreach, said the course, 12 Steps to Healing the Jewish Heart, which runs until Dec. 19, is a class in Judaism, "not a 12-step meeting, per se."

He said that while working at Beit Tshuvah in Los Angeles, North America's only non-Orthodox residential treatment facility for Jews in recovery, he "became convinced of the reality of the problem of addiction in the Jewish community, and that Jews were finding spirituality in 12-step recovery programs."

Twelve-step programs such as Alcoholics Anonymous have inspired many adaptations of mutual support groups around the world, said Rabbi Loevinger, and they have helped countless people turn away from destructive behaviours.

"Yet the wisdom of the 12 steps is nothing new. Teachings which parallel each of these steps are found in the Bible, the Talmud, the Siddur and other Jewish texts," he said.

There is no contradiction between Judaism and 12-step programs, he said. "They are both spiritual pathways towards healing, and getting in touch with a higher power. The difference is that Judaism is the religion of the Jewish people."

The purpose of the course, which is affirmed by many rabbis across the spectrum, said Rabbi Loevinger, is to help participants see how both Judaism and the 12 steps are rooted in spirituality. "It is a class for Jewish people in recovery from addictions to such things as alcohol, drugs, gambling or sex, who would like to deepen their connection with Judaism.

"It is a way to get their life back on track, or to help family members understand that Judaism has something to say in the process of recovery," he added.

He stresses that the course is a Kolel project "and while the confidential sharing of experiences will be encouraged, it is not a 12-step meeting. If any Jew needs a 12-step meeting, they should get in touch with JACS, a non-denominational fellowship of Jews in recovery from chemical dependency."

Some of the most profound spirituality has been found by Jews in recovery "because they face serious issues in their lives. These are people who are broken, and are looking to their tradition for healing," said Rabbi Loevinger.

"[The class] is a safe place to bring questions, and to get guidance along the path of recovery, Jewish healing, and spiritual growth," he said.

For information, call Kolel at 485-7007. Or to reach JACS, call 416-410-JACS.

Torah Ethics Project planned

TORONTO — Kiddush and chillul HaShem, the sanctification and desecration of God's name, are the focus of Toronto's second Torah Ethics Project.

The project is part of The S. Daniel Abraham and Ira L. Rennert Torah Ethics Project of The Orthodox Caucus, which is designed to "heighten the awareness and sensitivity of the community in the realm of interpersonal attitudes and behaviour."

This year's program will be launched by Rabbi Marc Angel, spiritual leader of Congregation Shearith Israel, the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue of New York. He will speak at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, on Oct. 29, at 8 p.m.

According to a media release, the Torah Ethics Project "takes a multi-faceted approach to teaching halachic ethical values, including special school curricula, synagogue study materials, media advertisements."

Performing a kiddush HaShem, the release goes on to explain, is "acting in a way that adds lustre to God's name, so as to bring honour in the eyes of the beholder to Jews, Torah, and ultimately to God."

A chillul HaShem, on the other hand, "brings disrepute in the eyes of the beholder to God, Torah or the Jews."

Those participating in the program receive a number of study guides that offer background, suggestions for discussion or different scenarios to illustrate the theme, divided as to age group.

For instance, elementary school students discuss an incident where three young children refuse to give up their seats to a woman carrying a baby, and passersby begin to question whether yeshiva students have any manners. Other situations include not reporting when a clerk gives back too much change, and dealing with a close friend involved in fraudulent schemes.

Among the schools arranging special programs on the topic are Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, Netivot Hatorah, Shearim Hebrew Day School, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Or Chaim Yeshiva and Ulpanat Orot. Shaarei Shomayim, Beth Jacob and Kehillat Shaarei Torah are among the synagogues arranging special programming.

There is also material available for home study.

For information, or to discuss taking part in the program, call Ilana Kelman, local coordinator, 416-633-5770.

A year to remember?

By JEFF ROSEN
News & Internet Editor

The Jewish new year is not even a month old and already historic events have marked this as a year that will long be remembered. As Jews were preparing to celebrate Rosh Hashanah, the death of former prime minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau came as a shock to all Canadians.

The late prime minister embodied the unusual combination of style and substance. He knew what he wanted to do and what he wanted to say and did both in a way that not only inspired, but also left a lasting mark on the nation.

Opinion

It has been 16 years since Trudeau's departure from politics, yet he remains one of our most popular political leaders. This says a lot, not only about the man himself, but also about the sorry state of the country's current crop of political leaders. Even those who disagreed with Trudeau's politics are now forced to admit that they admired his style. Maybe what they really admired was that he was a real leader, one who led from conviction rather than in response to poll results. I wonder how long the public will have to wait until another leader of his stature graces the political stage.

At the same time as we said our goodbyes to a great leader, another major event was unfolding around the world as Palestinians took to the streets and launched attacks on the Jewish people.

There has been much debate about who said what and who was responsible for which incident. Despite continued criticism of Israel, there should never have been any debate about the initial cause of the uprising. Israeli Likud Leader Ariel Sharon's visit was not the cause of the first riots. As an elected political leader and, more importantly, an Israeli citizen, he had every right to tour the Temple Mount area.

Was it a wise move? Maybe not.

Tensions in the region were already higher than normal. However, Palestinians were looking for a reason to pick a fight and Sharon's visit provided the perfect match for their powder keg of fury.

It is interesting to note that while Israel continues to be raked over the goals by the world media for injuring Palestinian children, no one has questioned why these youngsters are on the front lines of the conflict.

In every country, children are a society's first priority. If there is any sign of danger, every effort is taken to shield the most vulnerable from harm. Yet in this case, children have been on the front lines. As in any other conflict, casualties are a normal part of the equation. Why then is anyone surprised that children are being killed?

While stones and bullets continue to fly, the war of words in both camps continues to escalate – not only in the Middle East, but also in our own country. Palestinians have taken to protesting in front of the Israeli Embassy, burning flags, and shouting messages of hate against Israel and the Jewish people.

In the long run, such actions benefit no one; in fact they only serve to inflame the situation further. For in the long run, such rhetoric leaves a cancer of hatred in all parties involved, one that left untreated will spread like a malignant tumour.

The only winner in such a situation will be the forces of hatred.

Prime minister meets with community leaders

the UN's human rights committee in Geneva, Canada voted against a resolution that described Israeli actions as war crimes and crimes against humanity. In the other, held before the General Assembly, Canada abstained from a motion slamming Israel for excessive use of force. Both motions passed overwhelmingly.

Earlier the same day, the community delegation met with Opposition leader Stockwell Day to thank him for denouncing Canada's support of the Oct. 7 motion.

Canada's support of the motion has incensed the community. In rallies across the country last week, solidarity with Israel was pledged, just as Canada was denounced.

The Jewish delegation was led by Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), and included representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada.

Chrétien told the delegation to consult Laverdure "every day if you need to," Wilder relayed to The CJN.

"The Canada-Israel Committee has a direct link right now to the Prime Minister's Office," he added.

He called the establishment of a go-between "most unusual" but also "a major step" that could help avert problems in the future.

Asked under what circumstances the Jewish community would consult the PMO, Wilder said, "Under whatever circumstances we find there's an urgency. If a vote comes up at the United Nations, we'll be there and we'll be watching with great interest to see how Canada votes."

Accompanying Chrétien was Canada's new foreign affairs minister, John Manley; the prime minister's senior policy adviser, Eddie Goldenberg; Chrétien's director of policy and research, Chaviva Hosek; his executive assistant, Bruce Hartley; and Laverdure.

Despite the "warm, friendly and welcoming" tone of the meeting, Wilder, who spoke on behalf of the delegation, said he did not pull punches.

"We were quite forthright and we did not mince words. I didn't ask for [an apology] because I didn't think I was going to get it. I wanted to get more than an apology. My objective was to ensure, the best I could, that Canada would not repeat its error [at the UN].

"I thanked him for seeing us and told him that we were there because we had [not] seen such unrest and anxiety in the Jewish community since perhaps 1973. The Jewish community was exercised and upset, obviously by what was going on in the region, but particularly with the reactions of the Canadian government. I told him exactly what was on our minds."

Jews in this country felt "deserted" by their government, Wilder said he told Chrétien. "That was the term I used.

"I said, 'Prime Minister, you need to understand that what this man [Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat] does, is he uses violence as a tool for diplomacy, and that's what he did in order to counter the negative publicity and his loss of standing in the world.'"

Chrétien "listened very carefully. I went on to talk about how Arafat insidiously uses children. I told him that Arafat's bullets are stronger than the Israeli bullets because his bullets are the children."

Wilder said he told Chrétien that "to deal with the Palestinian Authority as a moral equivalent of Israel is anathema to us," and then for Canada to support the UN resolution "simply adds insult to injury."

The prime minister's response was, according to Wilder, that Arafat either didn't want peace, or couldn't make peace.

"And he went on to talk about how he would exercise every influence he could to address the cause of peace," Wilder recalled. "He raised the question of the two soldiers who were lynched [in Ramallah]. He found that absolutely abhorrent. He talked about the UN motion. I got the impression, [although] he didn't say it directly, that he wasn't aware of it at the time it happened. He did say had it not come up for another two days [following the beating death of the two reservists], that it never would have been supported by Canada.

"He said that's now water under the bridge, provided we don't have to cross that bridge again. He didn't say he regretted it. My hammering him was not going to make him do anything he wasn't going to do."

After the prime minister spoke, the delegation raised the issue of the three Israeli soldiers kidnapped and presumably being held in Lebanon.

"We asked him to intercede. He said, 'I've already done it. I established good relations when I was in the Middle East [last spring] with the president of Lebanon, and I've called him and told him that I want his help to get these people released.' "

Wilder said CJC president Moshe Ronen and Thomas Hecht, who chairs the CIC's Quebec region, raised the issue of the hateful and violent tone of Palestinian demonstrations in Canada.

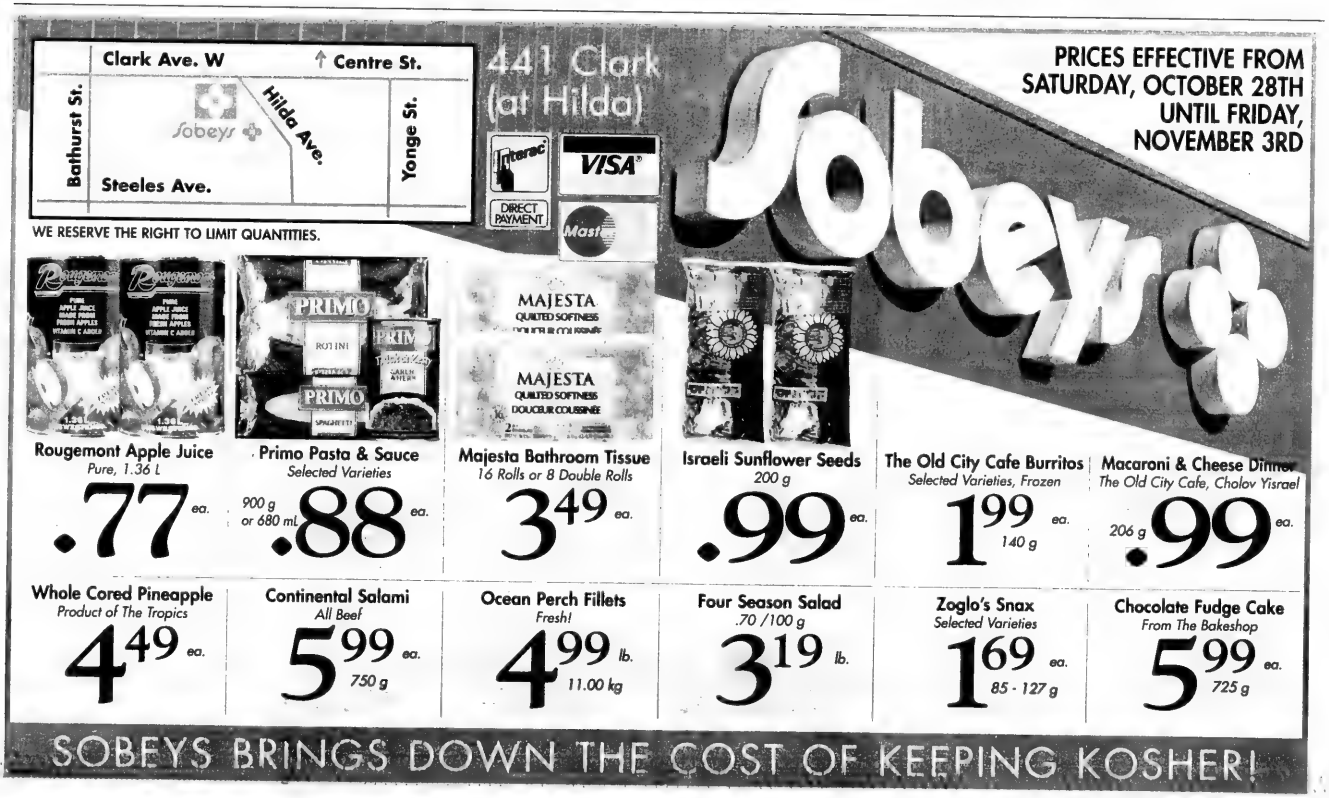
Chrétien "indicated he was very concerned about violence. He talked about the Charter of Rights, that he was a law-and-order person, that he had seen discrimination in Quebec when he was younger and that had no time or tolerance for it."

Overall, Wilder said, "we got a very, very good reception. [Chrétien] was patient and charming. He said he wants to help. 'I want to help you.' Those were his words.

"I don't expect miracles overnight. I'm optimistic. It was a very good meeting. I accept the prime minister's words, that he wants to help. I believe he will."

Wilder said Day "announced firmly right off the bat that he was not in favour of any votes contrary to Israel. He made a point of saying that he stands with Israel on a matter of principle, not politics, and that his support is steadfast and constant."

The Jewish delegation consisted of Wilder, Hecht, Ronen, CJC executive director Jack Silverstone, and B'nai Brith president Lawrence Hart and executive vice-president Frank Dimant.



Canada expected to have 'balanced attitude'

Milo told a Montreal news conference that Israel expected Canada, as a "friendly" country, to have a "balanced attitude." He was satisfied this is the approach Chrétien and the government wish to take.

Since the outbreak of Mideast violence, other special envoys, including Shimon Peres who was in Europe, have been visiting different countries.

"The problem is Israel's message is not coming through very well," said Milo. Arafat is intentionally "sacrificing" Palestinian children to derail the peace process, he added.

"Arafat and the PA are using children, sending them to the front, because they know a photo of a child killed is good for public relations. Arafat said he would sacrifice thousands for independence, but Oslo would have given him independence without war."

Milo alleged the PA is waging a campaign of "hatred" against Israel on Palestinian television and radio, and in the schools.

"The kids who are throwing stones are getting hatred in school, in their books, and not at home. It's almost anti-Semitism," he said.

"In Israel, school texts always speak of the dream of peace, but the Palestinians are educated for hatred from the first grade."

The uprising came as a "bitter surprise" to Israel, he said, because Israel and the Palestinians had been so close to an agreement.

"When Arafat refused at the last minute to sign the agreement after the Paris talks, we couldn't understand. Then there were the riots and the stones and the shooting by the Palestinian police, and we understood that Arafat did not mean peace," said Milo.

"He wants to go a different way. Suddenly, Arafat chose the route from peace to confrontation."

Milo, the former police minister, expressed his personal disillusionment, noting that he was one of only three opposition Likud members who voted for the Oslo accord in 1993.

"My friends are now saying, 'See, how could you give Arafat so much credit?' ... Israelis are asking themselves, 'What peace are we going toward? Why?'"

Milo is skeptical Arafat will stick to the Sharm al Sheikh agreement. "We will see if he is serious or not. For now we can't say; we have had a bad experience with Arafat."

Nevertheless, he stressed that Israel still wants peace with the Palestinians, as well as with Lebanon and Syria.

Milo said that in the wake of the Sharm al Sheikh agreement, Israel should slow down the peace process and "take it step by step... We must check every step we take and be very careful," he said.

Palestinian program gets government support

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The federal and Quebec governments and the City of Montreal are sponsors of a current three-week program organized by a local Palestinian group as a "means to increase public awareness" of Palestinian "aspirations of justice and dignity."

The program, titled Rhythms from Palestine, is being presented as a cultural event, and it includes music, poetry, theatre, films, art and photography exhibitions.

The film series is organized with Rashid Masharawi, founder of the Cinema Production and Distribution Centre in Ramallah, who is in Montreal for the event.

One scheduled documentary, released by Masharawi this year called Behind the Wall, is described as "protecting" Jerusalem against an "invasion" by Israeli settlers.

The film's political claim is that the Israelis' "goal is to rob everything, the houses... the names of places, and the soul of the city."

The 1993 feature film Curfew is said to be "an accurate depiction" of a Palestinian family "surviving in a constant state of emergency" under the Israelis. The 1998 documentary My Very Private Map is introduced as having been released on the 50th anniversary of the nakba (Arabic for catastrophe), "the 1948 event that forever changed the destiny of the Palestinian people," as Palestinians refer to Israeli statehood.

In a similar vein is 50 Years After the Expulsion, produced by the Palestinian ministry of information, which speaks of Palestinians being "uprooted from their towns and villages and 'temporarily' packed into camps..."

Canadian Jewish Congress Quebec region president Dorothy Zalcman Howard called the event "sheer Palestinian propaganda" and said it is "outrageous that city property is being used to promote inflammatory anti-Israel rhetoric, especially at this particularly sensitive juncture."

Presented as a cultural event

A panel discussion Oct. 26 at the Maison de la Culture Côte des Neiges concerns The Image of Palestinians in the Canadian Media and is scheduled to examine "the role of the media in creating and reinforcing prejudices against Palestinians and Arabs [that...] are the cause of a misinformed public in Quebec."

Poet and Hebron native Izzidine Al-Manasrah will give a recital at the Maison de la Culture Oct. 29.

"According to some Israeli critics, his poems fuelled the intifadah," the brochure states.

The entire program, which continues until Nov. 5, was organized by Medical Aid for Palestine-Canada (MAP) and is taking place at several venues, including the city-owned Maison de la Culture and the Château Dufresne Museum, and the National Film Board of Canada.

Listed sponsors are the Quebec government – as well as provincial agencies the Caisse de dépôt et placement and the Société Générale de Financement – Heritage Canada, and Montreal 2000.

The photo exhibition titled Palestine: Children of the Sand, which was held in Montreal City Hall 11 months ago, drew criticism from the Jewish community.

It is currently being reprised at the Château Dufresne. The photos by Quebecer Julie Paquet depict Palestinian children living in squalor in refugee camps, and the aim, according to the accompanying brochure, is to raise public awareness of their plight.

A text with the photos describes the children's hopes as being "constantly threatened by...lurking violence, ever-present violence... In vain will they seek to escape; a monstrous reality lies beyond: confinement. Oppression, both physical and political, can only breed fear and violence."

The photos are also on sale, with proceeds going to MAP, which, according to its information material, is a charitable, non-governmental organization founded in 1983. It says its goal is to improve the health and social conditions of Palestinians, as well as to "inform Canadians about the political, social and cultural issues underlying the Palestinian people's quest for nationhood and development."

The main brochure for Rhythms from Palestine contains a letter from Mayor Pierre Bourque saying he is "happy to see that this exhibition is making a comeback."

Among those attending the kick-off event, the opening of an exhibition of art by Palestinians at the Artothèque de Montréal, were Quebec Social Solidarity Minister André Boisclair, federal Liberal MP Yvon Charbonneau, Sen. Marcel Prud'homme, and Baker Abdel Munem, described as the representative of Palestine in Ottawa.

Zalcman Howard said CJC was "very surprised, to say the least," to see that the sponsors listed also include Canadian and the Québec among others.

"We will be protesting this most vigorously, she said.

You don't have to make headlines to cause a Chillul Hashem

But you don't have to be famous to cause a Chillul Hashem. You don't have to be Orthodox. And you don't even have to transgress a mitzvah.

All it takes is for any Jew to slip in awareness that he or she represents God and the Jewish people.

Cutting ahead on line. Acting arrogantly in public. Littering. Speeding through a red light.

People judge Jews. Jews judge Orthodox Jews. And through us they judge God and His Torah. Halacha therefore wants you to be concerned with how people perceive your behavior. No matter who you are. No matter how inconsequential it seems to you.

And it's not just public behavior. There's one-on-one Chillul Hashem too. When you unjustly favor a Jew over a non-Jew. When you lie, cheat on a partner or brazenly ignore an older person who needs your help to get across the street. In public and in private you must be aware of your Judaism. And aware of Whom and What you represent.

And let's be honest. Whether you're wearing a kippah or a hat, or even if you're bareheaded, you could still cause a Chillul Hashem. People at your workplace know you're Jewish. You might have a recognizably Jewish name. You might simply look Jewish. Regardless, if there's even the slightest doubt you might cause a Chillul Hashem, be careful. Halacha takes Chillul Hashem very seriously.

During the month of November, through The S. Daniel Abraham and Ira L. Rennert Torah Ethics Project of The Orthodox Caucus, hundreds of families in the greater Toronto area will focus on Chillul and Kiddush Hashem. In their synagogues, yeshivot and at their Shabbat tables, they will study, discuss and reflect on the many halachot and teachings about the desecration and sanctification of God's name.

After all, you can do anything you want to do to your name.

But not to God's.

PM reaches out to community

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Crises, whether in the Middle East or the political sector, often give politicians an opportunity to shine. Last week, the sun shone brightly on the copper-plated roofs of Parliament and a political disaster for the Liberals was adeptly salvaged by the little guy from Shawinigan.

As predicted here a couple of weeks ago, the PM did reach out to the community and had a "let's make up" meeting with Jewish community leaders. Word has it, he provided them with an impressive list of activities he agreed to undertake at the request of his good friend Mr. Barak.

Even if it didn't erase the anger resulting from Canada's Security Council vote, obviously the Canada Israel Committee was sufficiently impressed to call off the "full-court press." People are tight-lipped, but some Ottawa watchers believe the PM offered the group a pre-election goody. If so, nobody we know is talking.

As well as the PM performed, Stockwell Day may have done even better. His was a win-win situation and we've learned that the telegenic pretender to the throne is scoring points with Jews who are convinced of his sincerity. Apparently, more than a few showed up for his $1.7 million party last week in Toronto.

Irwin Cotler was another "winner" coming out of this crisis, at least in his Jewish riding of Mount Royal. But his "triumph" came at the cost of his standing within the Liberal caucus – where his fellow MPs felt he had stepped over the line.

In Toronto, the "Metro Ministers" took a beating, including Elinor Caplan, who was likely as upset at the government's UN vote as Cotler but was constrained by her Cabinet status. Luckily, she has the kind of credibility within her constituency that people will almost certainly believe that her interventions, and those of Jim Peterson and Art Eggleton, were just as effective as Cotler's, although not as loud or as public.

Friends in the Jewish community tell us, though, that the politicians who most endeared themselves were Joe Volpe and Carolyn Bennett, who sided against their own government and stood with their Jewish constituents. They, like Stockwell Day (strange bedfellows) reflected their conscience in taking the position they did. But we bet both Carolyn and Joe are hoping their Jewish friends are as quick – and loud – to praise them as they were to criticize the government.

Let's see if the leaders who went to Ottawa to meet the politicians understand that they still have some work to do!

Shortage of Jewish day school teachers addressed

TORONTO — York University's Jewish Teacher Education Program, in partnership with the Western Canadian Coalition of Jewish Educators, has won a $185,000 grant from the Covenant Foundation in New York to address the shortage of teachers at Jewish day schools.

It is the first time the prestigious foundation has awarded a Canadian proposal. "The Covenant Foundation saw this project as a model for other Jewish communities in North America seeking to prepare and recruit qualified teachers," said York University Prof. Alex Pomson, co-ordinator of the Jewish Teacher Education Program and Koschitzky Professor of Jewish Education at York.

"It is recognition that York is uniquely placed to develop innovative solutions for day schools facing pressing personnel needs," Pomson said.

York is the only public university in North America that certifies teachers for both the Jewish day school and the public systems concurrently. York's Jewish Teacher Education Program is a partnership between the Faculty of Education, the Centre for Jewish Studies at York and the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

York program wins grant

The proliferation of Jewish day schools across North America over the past decade reflects a concern in the Jewish community about a dilution of Jewish culture. This has created a huge demand for certified teachers. New schools opening in Toronto alone during this period have made the competition for scarce resources acute, particularly in smaller Jewish communities, such as those in Western Canada.

The York Western Canada project will recruit up to five students, every two years, from Jewish communities in Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia. The students will enter York's Jewish Teacher Education Program in the Faculty of Education, where they will acquire field-study and practice-teaching experience both in Toronto and western Canadian schools.

The grant will also allow York to work with partner schools in the west as special sites for teacher preparation. The western Canadian Jewish communities will provide scholarship support of up to 50 percent of university tuition and living expenses for the students during their undergraduate years. In return, students will commit to working for at least two years in day schools in Western Canada.

The Western Canadian Coalition of Jewish Educators was formed in 1997 by a group of Jewish day schools in Edmonton, Vancouver, Winnipeg and Calgary to work co-operatively in meeting program and personnel needs. It is co-ordinated by Joshua Ben-Simon, who, Pomson says, has played a crucial role in galvanizing communities in the west to see the teacher shortage as a common problem requiring common solutions.

"The grant acknowledges Ben-Simon's hard work and the coalition's imaginative response to the kinds of challenges faced by most Jewish communities today," Pomson said.

Barak orders talks to form national unity government

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak ordered negotiators from the One Israel coalition Sunday to initiate intensive talks with the Likud, Shas, Meretz and other parties, for the formation of an emergency national unity government.

Barak held a meeting Sunday at his office with the negotiating team he set up last week, including Communications Minister Binyamin Ben Eliezer, acting Interior Minister Haim Ramon and acting Labor and Social Affairs Minister Ra'anan Cohen, and asked them to begin negotiations immediately with other parties.

Ehud Barak

Barak is said to be keen to present his new government to the Knesset by next week, during the opening of the winter session of the legislature.

Internal Likud party polls conducted recently by sources affiliated with Likud leader Ariel Sharon show that more than 60 percent of party members oppose their entry into a government of national unity with Ehud Barak.

Only following an announcement of the demands presented to Barak by the Likud leader, did it appear that Sharon would enjoy a majority of support for the party's entry into an emergency unity government.

Among Sharon's demands are:

- equal membership of right- and left-wing members in the cabinet;
- the right to veto any diplomatic- or security-related decision;
- Sharon's appointment to deputy prime minister and full access to security and diplomatic materials;
- a written obligation to set a date for new elections, four months after the dissolution of the unity government.

If the Likud central committee approves the move to join in a government with Barak, Sharon intends to demand the finance ministry for himself and six other ministries for members of his party.

However, Sharon is faced with opposition among his party from MKs who lean toward former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Justice Minister Yossi Beilin warned that he would resign if Sharon were granted veto power on diplomatic issues in exchange for the Likud's participation in an emergency government.

Meretz party chairman Yossi Sarid said his party would not join a government in which Sharon were the "second prime minister." Sarid reiterated that he would rather sit in a government with the Shas party than with Sharon.

Iraq sends more troops to border with Jordan

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Recent American reports which indicated that Iraq was moving troops to its border with Jordan have been updated and show that the original force of one Iraqi division is now being reinforced.

The Iraqi troop movements were first observed by American forces some two weeks ago, and it was reported that the Hamurrabi division of the crack Republican Guards was heading toward the border.

According to American assessments, the movement was not considered to pose any threats to Iraq's neighbouring countries. However, following further transfers of troops to the region, the United States decided to issue a warning to Baghdad.

At this stage, the force seems to pose little threat to Israel unless it also includes ground-to-ground ballistic missiles. In addition, unless the force enters Jordanian territory, which Jordan, according to its treaty with Israel, is obligated to prevent, there is little military significance to the movement.

The Iraqi show of force is believed to be a move by Saddam Hussein to back his statements that the only way of dealing with "the Zionist entity" is for the Arab countries to make way for his forces to pass.

The presence of Iraqi land forces on the border with Jordan is therefore only potentially dangerous and may play a role if there is a broadening of the conflict in the region. It should also be remembered that the Iraqis are incapable of providing air cover to this force because of the American presence in the area.

Arab League leaves Arabs, Israel irate

By ALUF BENN and DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The carefully worded declaration released at the conclusion of the Arab League summit in Cairo last Sunday left very few in the region publicly satisfied.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak rejected the declaration for its use of the "language of threats" and the "call for continued violence against" Israel. In an official statement issued by the Prime Minister's Office, Israel also called on the Palestinians "to honour their commitments to halt the violence and incitement and to immediately restore calm and order."

Government spokesperson Nachman Shai was, however, also quick to point out the productive role at the meeting of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and "other moderates who balanced the extremists at the summit."

Among the first to criticize the declaration of the conference on the Palestinian side were the Islamic radical groups, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, who stressed that the positions of the Arab leaders were mild and "worthless." The two groups said that the intifadah would continue until Israel leaves the territories.

"The Arab and Muslim nations are disappointed with the results of the Arab League summit, which did not decide to cut off ties with Israel completely or to use oil supplies as a weapon," the two organizations stated.

Reactions among Arabs throughout the world reflected deep disappointment.

"We want war; we want jihad to liberate Jerusalem and Palestine from Jewish occupiers. Arab leaders should open the borders and let the people fight Israel," an Amman resident said.

In Egypt, thousands of university students demonstrated, calling for the Arab armies to be unleashed against Israel.

Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat did not respond to the statement of the Arab League; however, Palestinian Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabbo called the gathering "very positive and very important politically.

"The decisions have reiterated Arab backing for the intifadah as a peaceful popular movement and have strengthened this with financial support," he added. Rabbo was referring to the $1 billion (US) that was promised to bolster the Palestinian Authority and to compensate the families of more than 120 Palestinians killed in the clashes.

While the summit declaration did not call on Arab countries to cut relations with Israel, Tunisia withdrew its representation in Israel and requested that Israel call back its representative from Tunis. The Tunisian Foreign Affairs Ministry stated that the decision was taken as a result of "the dangerous escalation... of Israeli aggression against the Palestinian people."

Qatar is also considering breaking off ties with Israel and closing the commercial representation that Israel operates in the capital, Daha. Oman severed links with Israel prior to the summit.

While the two Arab states with full diplomatic ties with Israel, Egypt and Jordan did not cut ties with Israel, Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa, warned that the decisions reached at the summit were meant to show that "we mean business.

"The Arab countries are determined that there will be an escalation of Arab actions to match the escalation of the Israeli practices," Moussa added.

U.S. opposes plan for 'unilateral separation'

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States is opposed to Prime Minister Ehud Barak's plan for a unilateral separation from the Palestinians, but is willing to countenance a suspension of peace talks as long as violence continues.

An American source said President Bill Clinton is unable to adopt Barak's call for a "time out" in the diplomatic process, but "is not critical of Barak's decision." He added that phone conversations between the two leaders on the weekend were conducted in a "good atmosphere."

Reiterating his call for a "time out" at last weekend's cabinet meeting, Barak said, "To all appearances the Palestinians have chosen not to continue along the path of Camp David, and have turned to violence in an attempt to achieve international support for the establishment of a Palestinian state without an agreement with Israel."

The purpose of a time out, according to Barak, is "to reassess the political process from the beginning in light of events of the past weeks."

Barak has recently held more talks on a unilateral separation, based on the assessment that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat intends to declare an independent Palestinian state on Nov. 15. Barak has decided not to evacuate isolated settlements as part of a separation, after realizing that Likud chair Ariel Sharon would not agree to such a process, according to one political source.

Speaking against a unilateral separation by Israel, American Ambassador Martin Indyk said in an address Sunday in Herzliyah: "Israelis and Palestinians are fated to live together, side by side. No separation can exist under these conditions."

Arafat pushing for war?

in the West Bank, Jibril Rajoub, are still refusing to meet with Shin Bet security service chief Avi Dichter.

In Arafat's preferred scenario, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would resemble Kosovo: increasing international involvement, foreign observers and troops, and, finally, an imposed settlement – which would be better for the Palestinians than what the Americans offered at Camp David.

The instant that parties other than the Americans are involved, Arafat profits. An Israeli mistake – bombing civilians, a massacre by settlers – or a new, more hesitant American administration would also help.

And if Plan A does not achieve its goals, Arafat would still have the option of a regional conflict. His hope is that once the smoke clears, a Palestinian state will emerge, perhaps with better borders than Ehud Barak and Bill Clinton have offered him.

In the meantime, there are three tactical junctures to be manoeuvred. The first occurred Thursday last week when, in Israel's view, the 48 hours allotted for implementing a ceasefire expired. (In the Palestinian view, the deadline was last Friday). Second was the Arab League summit last weekend.

But the most important will come sometime this week, when Israel, finally convinced that Oslo, like Sharm, is a dead letter, will have to decide what to do. For the first time, it will have to consider taking the initiative, rather than merely responding to events.

Despite differences of opinion within the general staff, most of the generals still favour restraint. But continued escalation by Arafat would change their mind. "We cannot become reconciled to a reality of daily attacks," said one. "A war of attrition is the worst scenario ... it would be better to sharpen [the conflict]."

Against this background, a unilateral declaration of a Palestinian state – probably sometime between the end of the Arab summit and Nov. 15, which is Palestinian Independence Day – becomes more likely.

Ironically, this would also have advantages for Israel, which would be seen as justified in taking steps to guarantee its own interests, such as separating more decisively from the Palestinians, seizing key positions, and even annexing part of Area C, the part of the territories still under full Israeli control.

The most worrying scenario is a regional conflict. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak has been working for restraint, but Iraq, Iran and Hezbollah are working for war.

Using TV footage, Israel nabs lynching suspects

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has reportedly arrested a number of Palestinians involved in the lynching of two Israeli reserve soldiers last week in Ramallah.

Palestinian sources say 10 suspects have been arrested, including Palestinian police officers, while Israeli security sources say that between six to eight suspects are currently in Israeli custody.

Vadim Norzhich and Yosef Avrahami were lynched and brutally beaten to death by a Palestinian mob in the Ramallah police station on Oct. 12. Israel then attacked key positions in Ramallah and elsewhere in the West Bank in retaliation.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Transportation Minister Amnon Lipkin Shahak, both former chiefs of staff, publicly warned that Israel "will settle accounts" with the murderers. Current Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz and Communications Minister Benjamin Ben Eliezer personally vowed revenge to the families of the murdered men.

Since the lynching, the Israel Defence Forces have concentrated large numbers of crack units in Ramallah. Shin Bet security service agents have also been operating in the area in an attempt to capture those responsible.

Palestinian sources say some of those arrested were apprehended in villages in Area B, which is under Palestinian civilian and Israeli military control, near Ramallah. Others, say the sources, were caught in Area A villages, which are under full PA auspices, thus violating the Oslo Accords.

Israel did not respond officially to this charge, but did confirm it was holding some of the perpetrators.

The Palestinian man captured on film holding up his blood-soaked hands was among those taken into custody, according to Palestinian sources. Authorities used the gruesome footage, captured by an Italian film crew, of the mob beating the reservists to death to identify the perpetrators.

A number of the participants in the lynching are clearly visible in the footage. Aware they had been filmed, some of the assailants had reportedly gone underground.

In a similar case two years ago, which was also filmed by news photographers, an Israeli soldier was set upon and badly beaten by a mob outside Ramallah. Almost a year later, one of the assailants was arrested by Israel authorities after he left Ramallah and travelled to Tel Aviv.

The IDF feels Israel has regained some of its deterrence capabilities by acting against the lynchers, and the defence establishment welcomed the reports of the arrests. However, a senior Fatah activist warned of an "angry response" by the Palestinians should it emerge that Israel infiltrated PA territory to capture those who took part in the lynching.

"I think our reaction will be very grave. This gives Palestinians a free hand," said Hussein Sheik.

"Now, you give us the right to go after those who killed Mohammed Duri," he said, referring to the 12-year-old Palestinian shot dead by IDF troops at the Netzarim junction.

Increase in violence has French Jews tense

By JOSHUA SCHUSTER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — The presence of French riot police has dampened spirits somewhat in the Marais, the usually lively Jewish neighbourhood here in the French capital.

Recently, local Jews could be seen going about their business in the cluttered district of falafel stands, butchers, bakers and bookstores. The smells of hummus and freshly made challah hung in the air, as they do six days a week, but customers were few and their pace seemed a bit more brisk than usual.

Just the same, in a sign that routines were continuing, a chassidic man bearing a lulav and etrog warmly beckoned any passers-by, particularly tourists, to join in some of the rituals associated with the holiday of Sukkot.

The well-known old Jewish quarter is just one of dozens of Jewish religious and communal sites across the nation where police have set up stakeouts in hopes of ending a series of incidents that targeted Jews and Jewish sites across France.

French Jews have reacted with mixed feelings to the spate of anti-Semitic incidents, which began after fighting broke out between Israel and the Palestinians late last month.

While Jewish leaders issue calls for communal steadfastness in the face of the incidents, some members of the community dread walking the streets alone. They say that the wave of anti-Semitism has heightened tensions and confusion within the Jewish community to levels not seen since World War II.

Others, however, note that a police presence at Jewish sites is quite common in France – and, they add, they are not about to change their routines.

"There is some fear, but it is not at all like it was between 1939 and 1945," said Alain Derey, a Paris resident. "There is some tension, especially when you see a group of young Arab kids walking around in groups. But, really, we are ready to defend ourselves."

Sophie Ruben, a lawyer living in a suburb north of Paris, called the incidents "very serious," but said they only served to reinforce her Jewish identity.

"I'll continue to go to the synagogue and observe the holidays, because you can't let such threats stop your beliefs."

However, others have remarked that they have seen a decline in the number of Jews wearing yarmulkes in the streets. On one recent evening, an observer noticed a small group of children walking in the streets who donned their skullcaps only after meeting up with a much larger group of Jews.

Theo Klein, honorary president of CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations, said he "was not persuaded" that the recent acts of violence "are even anti-Semitic. These are spontaneous acts by people who like violence."

Klein called "absurd" the "overly emotional" reaction of some of his fellow Jewish community members, who have likened the incidents to Holocaust-era violence.

Noted intellectual and community activist Alain Finkielkraut, however, said that "it is normal that Jews have fear. A certain anti-Semitism has become now common in the streets."

He added that "people should be able to criticize Israel without having to revert to anti-Semitism."

Firebombs thrown at synagogues

Joseph Sitruk, France's chief rabbi, pleaded for composure among the Jewish community, but acknowledged that he was "divided between revulsion and worry."

In an incident reflecting the nervousness felt by some in the community, Sitruk announced in a radio broadcast recently that six young Jews had been stabbed and one had died.

But a few hours later, he returned to the airwaves to say that the attack was a false rumour and asked that everyone stop spreading gossip that "only adds to the current anguish."

Since the outbreak of violence in the Middle East, French Jewish officials have recorded more than 80 acts against Jews in their own country.

These are some of the recent incidents:

- Firebombs were thrown at synagogues in Creil and at the Jewish community centre in Colombes, both in the Paris region;
- A door of a synagogue in southern France was doused with gasoline and set on fire;
- The doors of two Jewish homes in Orly, south of Paris, were set on fire;
- Students at a day school in Paris were pelted with objects and subjected to insults as they left school;
- In Strasbourg, located near the border with Germany, a Jewish-owned bakery was left to burn when a blazing car was pushed through the shop window. Among the store's melted glass and scorched walls, the perpetrators had scrawled "Jews, assassins," and "Hezbollah" – remarks similar to other graffiti spray-painted recently on synagogues, Jewish schools and homes.
- In Trappes, a tiny town next to Versailles, a small synagogue was burned to the ground by arsonists.

"We are just a small community," said a young member of the synagogue who declined to give her name.

"That is why we don't understand. It is horrible. There were some very precious things inside the synagogue."

Police believe the majority of such acts are committed by a small group of disgruntled teenagers.

Jewish community members suspect members of the extreme right, as well as hoodlums from the Arab community, have been involved. But Jewish leaders insist the violence is coming from a few unorganized troublemakers.

Leading Islamic religious figures have been quick to join rabbis in denouncing the violence.

The Jewish community is asking the government to dramatically increase the police presence at Jewish sites and to set harsh penalties for those caught engaging in violence or making threats.

Moreover, during a meeting with French officials last week, Jewish leaders asked the government to consider using army forces if the anti-Semitic violence persists.

French President Jacques Chirac, who was recently criticized for his apparent bias toward the Palestinians when a summit of Middle East leaders and U.S. President Bill Clinton was held in the French capital earlier this month, has denounced the violence as "unacceptable."

"These manifestations of intolerance," said Chirac, "undermine in an inadmissible way the values and traditions" of France.

Prime Minister Lionel Jospin said the government would react with the "utmost severity" against "all those responsible for acts of violence or racist and anti-Semitic slogans."

However, only three teen-age suspects have been arrested so far.

British Jews tighten security after attack

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — David Myers' rabbi did not budge from Myers' bedside all night. Holding a prayer-book and uttering psalms non-stop, he prayed for the rapid recovery of the 20-year-old yeshiva student who was stabbed more than 20 times on Oct. 16 by a young Arab of Algerian descent.

Myers underwent emergency surgery and was struggling for his life, listed in serious, but stable, condition.

Myers was sitting on the upper level of a double-decker bus that passes through the haredi neighborhood of Stamford Hill in north London. He was staying with his parents in London during the Sukkot holiday while on break from his studies at Yeshiva College in Gateshead, in northern England.

Myers' friends describe him as a strong and quiet young man, who never got involved in fights.

He was reading on the bus, on his way to visit a friend in Stamford Hill, when he was attacked with a knife by a male assailant. The shocked Myers tried to defend himself but soon collapsed in his seat, bleeding profusely.

The assailant then ran down the steps to the lower level of the bus and disembarked, threatening the driver with the knife on the way out. He shouted curses against Jews and then proceeded to walk away "as if nothing had happened," one witness said.

The frightened passengers left the bus in a hurry as the driver stopped at a nearby bakery to call police. Ze'ev Cooperstein, who works in the bakery, was one of the first ones to rush to help Myers.

"One of the workers screamed to me: 'Someone stabbed a Jewish youth on the bus.' After we called the police, I took a first aid kit and ran to the bus to assist the injured person. There were still a lot of students exiting from the bus in great shock," said Cooperstein, who is trained in first aid.

Stabbed in head

"It was evident that he had been stabbed many times in his head and all over his body. It was a terrible sight. I asked him several questions, but I didn't want to make things any harder for him."

An ambulance that happened to pass by gave emergency treatment to Myers and transported him to hospital.

A large contingent of police quickly arrived on the scene and blocked access to the bus. At the same time, some civilian eyewitnesses began to pursue the assailant, who boarded a bus travelling in the opposite direction.

After receiving his description, two police officers arrested Nabil Ould Eddine, 27, who was taken to the police station and interrogated throughout the night. The next day, police recommended that he stand trial on charges of attempted murder.

A day after the incident, Stamford Hill returned to its usual holiday routine. No signs remained of the bloody attack. But the attack spread fear among the Jewish community, which put heightened security measures into effect at Jewish schools, synagogues and community institutions.

The Stamford Hill community, home to thousands of Satmar Chassidim, found it hard to understand why their neighbourhood was singled out for the attack since it is considered largely anti-Israel.

But Jewish leaders explained that Myers was attacked because his beard, kippah and prayer-book identified him as a Jew; his attitude toward Israel was of no interest to his assailant.

The Jewish community is angry over the passive attitude of the authorities toward the incitement by radical Islamic leaders in England. Following the publication of a call by Muslim extremists last week to kill Jews, the Board of Deputies of British Jews called on the authorities to clamp down on those responsible for the incitement and to issue indictments.

The Israeli Embassy in London joined this call for swift action against Islamic incitement. Ambassador Dror Zeigerman expressed Israel's anger over the failure of the authorities to act against those calling for the death of Jews.

Eddine will be held in custody for the duration of the legal proceedings against him. He was scheduled to appear in court on Oct. 18 in London.

Hezbollah brags of counter-espionage coup against Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak asked the United Nations last week to undertake an intensive effort to gain the release of Elhanan Tannenbaum, an Israeli citizen kidnapped by Hezbollah. Barak made the request directly of UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, during the Oct. 16-17 meetings at Sharm al Sheikh, Egypt.

"The kidnapping of [Israeli] citizens from the territory of sovereign states is an unacceptable situation which the international community should not accept," said Barak.

Annan, whose intensive efforts led to setting up the Sharm al Sheikh summit, condemned the kidnapping and said the UN will examine ways of obtaining Tannenbaum's release.

The daughter of the kidnapped man, Keren, 26, appealed last week to all relevant authorities to work for the release of her father. In a message which she read outside their home, she described the kidnapping as "inhuman" and said her father was a sick man who needed medicine.

Hezbollah Secretary General Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah

For his part, Hezbollah Secretary General Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah held a press conference in Lebanon and announced that the radical Shiite organization was holding reserve Lt.-Col. Elhanan Tannenbaum.

Nasrallah described how Hezbollah duped and captured the Israeli citizen and denied allegations that Iran had given assistance to the covert operation.

The capture, which Nasrallah announced on Oct. 15, raised the number of Israelis kidnapped by the Iranian-backed Hezbollah to four. Hezbollah captured three Israeli soldiers from the Har Dov area near the Lebanese-Israeli border on Oct. 7.

Nasrallah described the operation as a "counter-espionage activity" in which the Hezbollah responded to an attempt by the Mossad, Israel's intelligence agency, to penetrate the organization.

Hezbollah maintains that Tannenbaum is an Israeli intelligence operative, a charge which Israeli sources vehemently deny.

Nasrallah dismissed the condemnations of the kidnapping as a violation of international law. "This is not an abduction," he said.

"When you have an officer with the rank of colonel who has worked for a long time for the Mossad, and wanted to penetrate Hezbollah at a high level, and comes to Lebanon of his own free will … it is the legitimate right of the resistance [Hezbollah] to capture and detain him."

Hezbollah has a history of using kidnapping as a weapon. During the 1980s, the radical organization kidnapped a number of Westerners, including negotiators and journalists, some of whom it held for years.

The Hezbollah chief insisted Tannenbaum was not abducted outside Lebanon, but arrived in the country of his own free will. He said a member of Hezbollah living abroad was approached by the Israeli, who wished to spy on the organization, and that information about the group was given to Tannenbaum in order to establish credibility.

Elhanan Tannenbaum

According to Nasrallah, the Israeli was later persuaded to come to Lebanon, for a meeting with the Hezbollah contact, via Brussels and on what the organization insists was a forged passport. Nasrallah also said Tannenbaum confessed.

"We were able to confirm what we long suspected: that he is a Mossad officer with the rank of colonel and that he was formerly the commander of an artillery brigade that took part in Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and shelled Beirut," said Nasrallah.

The week in Israel

Oct. 16

• Israel accused Iran of orchestrating the Hezbollah kidnapping of Elhanan Tannenbaum, an Israeli businessman and reserve officer. The abduction is part of "a worldwide campaign of terrorism orchestrated by Iran," Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh told CNN.

• The personal papers and literary archive of the late poet Yehuda Amichai were given to Yale University's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library.

Oct. 17

• The Arrow 2 anti-missile system is operational, military officials said.

• Venture capitalists invested just over $1 billion (US) in Israeli firms last year, according to a report issued by Price Waterhouse Coopers and 3i, a venture capital firm. Israel ranks 10th in the world for investors, the report said.

Oct. 18

Oct. 19

• Shots were fired again yesterday into the Gilo neighbourhood in Jerusalem, from the neighbouring Palestinian village of Beit Jala. The shots were aimed at IDF tank positions near Gilo. No injuries or damage were reported.

Oct. 20

• Barak reiterated his fear that the Palestinians may no longer be partners "for the difficult decisions needed for pace."

Tanzim can't stop the intifadah

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — "The current intifadah cannot be stopped by an order, just as it wasn't begun at our order," said Marwan Barghuti, secretary-general of Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction and the leader of the Tanzim militias.

He expects the intifadah to continue, and perhaps even intensify, adding that he personally favours continuing the violent uprising against Israel, Barghuti said in a telephone interview with Ha'aretz last week, just after Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat returned from the U.S.-brokered meeting in Sharm al Sheikh.

Asked whether he would obey an order from Arafat to stop the rioting, he responded: "And if I give an order, they will stop? Are you mad?… I can try to persuade, but we are talking about the public, the street, not an army used to obeying orders."

Barghuti, 41, began his political activism while a student at Bir Zeit University. He has done time in an Israeli prison, was exiled with Arafat to Tunis, and is considered a leading figure in Fatah. He has frequently expressed disappointment with the Oslo process and urged Arafat to take a harder line in negotiations with Israel.

Will there be a ceasefire?

The incidents are continuing. There are many marches and demonstrations. I think one person has been killed today, so far. It is impossible to speak about a ceasefire because there aren't two equal sides. One side has tanks, planes and missiles; the other side has victims, almost 100 dead and 5,000 wounded. This is a popular uprising, intifadah, which has one clear message: End the occupation.

But we were at the height of a peace process.

It wasn't a peace process… The settlements continued to grow, prisoners weren't released, there was no Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories. Israel didn't honour its agreements.

Then you will not obey Arafat's orders to end the rioting and the shooting?

I am loyal to the president. My relationship with him is very good… But we are not soldiers. I am also active in politics and head the Fatah movement in the territories. Fatah and its members are leading the current intifadah.

If you and your colleagues are leading the intifadah, won't you obey Arafat's order to stop it?

The intifadah can't be stopped by an order, just at it wasn't started at our order. If anyone gave orders to start it, it was Ariel Sharon, with his visit to Al-Aksa, and Ehud Barak, who permitted [the visit], and who bears responsibility for the murder of worshippers at Al-Aksa on the following Friday.

But the two sides reached an understanding on restoring calm at Sharm al Sheikh.

What happened at Sharm al Sheikh? Nothing happened! They decided to return to the situation as it was on September 28, before the crisis erupted. Were things so good then? None of us wants to return to what was then. There was disappointment and despair… Therefore, the current intifadah will continue, and perhaps even intensify. I personally don't want it to stop. Let's say there is quiet. What then? We'll wait another 10 years.

Do you and your colleagues have control over the demonstrators or not? Can you restore calm?

Israelis don't understand what a popular uprising is… If I give an order to stop, they will stop? Are you mad? This is a broad public, it's the street. I can try to persuade, but I can't give orders. This isn't an army.

Then will you try to persuade?

We have reached the limit of our patience. You know me and my friends. We're the Fatah. We're the Palestinian peace camp. But Israeli policy has pushed us into a corner. Pushed and pushed until the explosion came and everything blew up. You, the Israelis, can't obtain peace without paying a price… You have to choose: Either occupation or peace.

Summit draws protest throughout Arab world

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Some 7,000 students at Cairo's Shams University protested last week against what they called the "humiliating" results of the Sharm al Sheikh summit, while Arab nations that did not take part in it criticized the meeting for failing to bring any benefit to the Palestinians.

Arab League Secretary General Esmat Abdel Meguid called on Israel to "carry out and abide by what was agreed upon in Sharm al Sheikh" and to "create the atmosphere that opens the way for the peace process to resume on a basis that achieves stability and guarantees the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people."

But the students demonstrating in Cairo called on their government to break off diplomatic ties with Israel and scrap the peace accord between the two countries.

In Lebanon, acting prime minister Selim al-Hoss said the summit failed to resolve the fundamental Palestinian problems that sparked the recent violence between Israel and the Palestinians.

"We were hoping the meeting would result in an announcement of clear principles to resolve the national issues which caused the Palestinian uprising, including [sovereignty over] Jerusalem, the return of refugees and the Israeli presence on Arab land," said Hoss.

In Jordan, a statement by 13 opposition groups said the Sharm al Sheikh meeting "undermines" the Arab summit, which was scheduled to be held in Cairo last Saturday, Oct. 21.

Jordanian political activists – most of them leftist Muslim fundamentalists – said they planned to escalate a campaign against normal ties with Israel by publicizing a "blacklist" containing the names of 30 Jordanians who have contacts with Israel.

Syrian President Bashar Assad arrived in Riyadh last week and held talks with Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah on the Middle East peace process ahead of the Arab League meeting. State-run Damascus Radio said the visit was part of Syria's continued efforts to form "a strong Arab front" that could exploit Arab potential to confront Israel's "intolerance."

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright also flew to Riyadh to brief Saudi leaders about the results of the Sharm al Sheikh summit, and also hoped to take advantage of Bashar Assad's presence there to meet with the Syrian leader.

In Iran, Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi said the ceasefire reached at the summit only served to quell Palestinians without advancing their rights.

"The imposed peace has given the Palestinian nation nothing," said Kharrazi, "and the popular Intifadah movement is the voice of protest by the Palestinian nation, which seeks martyrdom to realize its trampled rights."

In Iraq, the cabinet, after a meeting chaired by leader Saddam Hussein, said that "regaining Palestine will only be [accomplished] through liberation, jihad [holy war] and by mobilizing the Arab nation's potentials.

"Any attempt out of this path ... is considered an attempt to blow dust in the eyes of Arab fighters," it said.

Iraq confirmed last week that it would take part in the Arab summit – the first time it has been invited to such an Arab meeting since 1990.

Mubarak rejects calls for war against Israel

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak last week again attacked Middle East leaders who have called for a war against Israel. In a lengthy interview Oct. 18 on Egyptian television, Mubarak also dismissed criticism voiced against the Sharm al-Sheikh summit.

Were it not for the summit, said Mubarak, the number of Palestinian fatalities would "already stand at 200 or 300 people.

"God knows what would have happened to the [Palestinian] Authority," he said, adding that the summit was "the best thing we could have done under these circumstances," and was aimed at "saving the Palestinian people."

During recent weeks, the leaders of Iraq, Libya and Yemen have called on Arab countries to wage war against Israel. Mubarak has disparaged these calls to fight "to the last Egyptian soldier" and stressed last week that "we don't agree to such a thing."

According to Mubarak, the upcoming Arab summit "will not discuss a declaration of war, but rather a strategy of peace."

"Research chairs such as this one would not exist without the support of dedicated members of the community such as Reva James Leeds," says Joe Rotman, co-chair of the Research Advisory Committee of the Baycrest Board of Directors.

"She understands that improving the care we deliver to the bedside will depend on developing fundamental knowledge of the brain through the type of research occurring at the Institute and Baycrest."

The Chair will be based at Baycrest's internationally-renowned Rotman Research Institute. The Institute's primary focus is to understand changes that occur in the brain during normal aging and in the presence of conditions such as Alzheimer's disease, depression and stroke.

"This generous gift helps our researchers continue to do the excellent science that underpins how we diagnose, treat and rehabilitate those with brain disorders," says Stephen W. Herbert, Baycrest President and CEO.

The first recipient of the Reva James Leeds Chair in Neuroscience and Research Leadership will be Dr. Donald Stuss, the founding director of the Rotman Research Institute and vice-president of research at Baycrest, and an internationally recognized neuroscientist.

A Lanzmann film to be screened at Holocaust Education Week

By FLORENCE JACOBOWITZ
Special to The CJN

On October 31, Claude Lanzmann's A Visitor From the Living (1997) will be screened at York University in conjunction with Holocaust Education Week. Mr. Lanzmann will be present to discuss his film.

Shot in 1979, as part of the Shoah project (1985), Lanzmann's interview with Maurice Rossel, a representative of the International Red Cross Committee who visited Auschwitz in 1943 and Theresienstadt in 1944, was not included in the final nine-hour film Shoah.

Having had to distill a film from 350 hours of footage, Lanzmann felt the Rossel interview did not fit the structure of Shoah; he later decided to use the material in A Visitor From the Living, which was released in France in 1997.

Although the film stands on its own, it should be placed within the context of what Simone de Beauvoir called Lanzmann's chef d'oeuvre, Shoah.

Shoah is a remarkable work which investigates the Nazi's systematic annihilation of European Jewry during World War II. The film uses eyewitness testimony in a unique manner – to re-enact the past in the present. What one sees is not a retelling of the memory of an event but a re-experiencing of it.

Much of the first-hand testimony Lanzmann seeks to collect of the process of mass murder is not easily forthcoming. His task is to create the conditions whereby testimony which has been carefully buried, denied or remains too traumatic to be spoken, will be brought to the surface and voiced.

The Nazi crimes of methodical genocide profited from their policy of concealment, from complicit denial, willed ignorance or in the case of some of the victims, trauma, which inhibits the possibility of fully bearing witness.

In addition, few survived who could provide the kind of firsthand eyewitness testimony to the re-enactment of the Final Solution that Lanzmann pursues.

Lanzmann's perseverance and approach to his subject results in a film which revivifies the past in the present, penetrating and at times dissolving the temporal distance which separates the viewer from the past.

Lanzmann's role as the director – the metteur-en-scène – is to set the scene, to provide the conditions for the eyewitness to replay his role, and his performance helps activate the lived experience.

Unlike the traditional documentary, where the director is an invisible presence guiding the viewer through the presentation of facts illustrated by interviews and archival footage, Lanzmann insists on precise and accurate recollection sometimes providing the details: "I'll help you remember" he tells a forgetful Dr. Franz Grassler, former Nazi commissioner of the Warsaw Ghetto.

For this reason, Lanzmann has often claimed that his work is not a documentary, nor does it depend upon a representational approach.

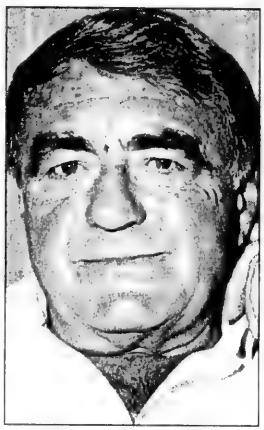
Lanzmann's film is still, I feel, a documentary (all documentaries employ aesthetics), but it is one that reinterprets how non-fiction filmmaking functions, particularly when the topic like the Shoah challenges the bounds of familiar discourse.

Fictional strategies are used as a means to an end; Lanzmann uses characters, or as he calls them personnages, mise-en-scéne. He often situates his journey at the "scene of the crime," and even demands the viewer's imaginative participation, but ultimately, what is achieved is a presentation of historical truth.

Lanzmann has described the results of this unique process of eliciting testimony a form of incarnation or resurrection.

Shoah opens with a dedication from Isaiah, "I will give them an everlasting name." This urgency to commemorate, to resurrect and give an everlasting name to the millions slaughtered, sets the tone of the project. The film takes the form of a cinematic lamentation of loss, one that grieves and mourns the near eradication of European Jewry.

A Visitor From the Living is also permeated with melancholy; Maurice Rossel, a representative of a 'neutral' humanitarian organization who describes his job as "seeing beyond" the surface, defends his act of signing a report that essentially condoned the Nazi crimes and helped seal the fate of their victims.



Claude Lanzmann

Shot in Rossel's comfortable study in his home in 1979, the film, while appearing to take the form of a conventional interview, is complex and nuanced. Using a camera that needed to be reloaded every 11 minutes, Lanzmann's dexterity in cross-examining his eye-witness and leading him to the point where revelatory moments surface, evidences his ability as the metteur-en-scène who carefully creates the conditions for this to happen.

As in Shoah, the film depends on an active viewer who is asked to read facial expression, gestures and language, and periodically the camera tracks in close to allow for this scrutiny. Lanzmann's request to interview Rossel was, at first, denied, and it was only after showing up at his door that Rossel allowed him in.

Lanzmann gently gains his trust before challenging Rossel's observation of what he witnessed and the reports he subsequently wrote. Rossel, for example, vividly recalls his meeting the "elegant" and "distinguished" commandant at Auschwitz and details his conversation regarding bobsledding in Switzerland, but has to be prodded as to his thoughts of the skeletal prisoners he saw or his recollection of any evidence of extermination at Auschwitz.

Rossel is then questioned about his invited visit to Theresienstadt, a carefully staged and rehearsed performance set up by the Nazis explicitly for outsiders' inspection. When asked about his perception of the theatrical circumstances, Rossel contemptuously recalls the "passivity" of the Jews and perceives them to be the wealthy and privileged powerful elite who paid and bought their improved conditions in Theresienstadt. He repeats his thinly veiled disgust for their docility, their failure to signal to Rossel their protest of the elaborate masquerade.

Lanzmann responds with an unrelenting detailed analysis of Rossel's absurd report, countering his rapturous account of the children's playground, the waitresses who served meals, and a vulgar remark about elderly married couples not minding being separated at night, with facts regarding the reality of the camp: the inhuman conditions, the starvation, the execution of the "mayor" Dr. Epstein (of whom Rossel can recall almost nothing) shortly after the Red Cross delegate's visit.

As Rossel acknowledges being appalled at the time by the Jews' passive attitude, he reveals some awareness that he was witnessing a hoax that he did not care to protest. In fact, Rossel betrays his anti-Semitism when he tellingly remarks that the Swiss considered the German approach to the Jewish problem as anathema, without denying that the Jews were a problem.

In 1979, despite all historical evidence attesting to the tragic reality of Theresienstadt, Rossel remained unwilling to retract his decision to sign a document that supported the Nazi deception or to express regret or contrition. Lanzmann is rewarded for some of this in a letter he received from Rossel, a response to Lanzmann's request for permission to use the interview.

He quotes from this letter at the start of the film, savouring Rossel's comment that he is now "wiser or crazier" and pleads that Lanzmann not make him look too foolish, to which Lanzmann adds, "I did not intend to do so."

He doesn't have to. A Visitor From the Living examines Rossel's consistence. He presents himself as a well-to-do self-satisfied Swiss physician who defends his willingness to be fooled, who nostalgically evidences his admiration for the commandant at Auschwitz as an enviable confrère, who divulges his lack of interest in the plight of those he knew were suffering because he was disgusted by their apparent acquiescence and the assumption that they could "buy" sanctuary.

Does it matter that Rossel refuses to be accountable?

It is, perhaps, less important than the nauseating sense of abandonment and betrayal the viewer experiences by watching a member of the International Red Cross rationalize his relinquishing an opportunity to have acted and voiced his protest.

Lanzmann's film ends with his assessment of Dr. Epstein's speech to his fellow Jews, where he describes their plight and his frustration, metaphorically, in terms of a boat that can find no harbour or shelter (coupled with the knowledge of his subsequent death) as heartbreaking. The film's elegiac tone is underscored by periodic cutaway shots of present-day Theresienstadt, empty and desolate.

A Visitor From the Living's theme – Rossel's lack of interest in seeing beyond the façade, instead playing the role of an objective Red Cross delegate visiting a model camp populated with ill-treated deportees – raises many existential questions about authenticity and performance and the imperative of engaging with life in a genuine and accountable manner.

With these films Lanzmann, the colleague of Jean-Paul Sartre, teaches a lesson about living morally and responsibly, bearing witness, resisting forgetting. As the Holocaust recedes into the past with each year, the urgency of these lessons intensify.

Florence Jacobowitz teaches film studies at York University and is on the editorial board of CinéAction.

Ludwig paintings extoll colours of the north

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When she is walking across permafrost or trying to climb a formidable iceberg, Margaret Ludwig sometimes asks herself, "What am I doing up here?"

The answer is clear in her exhibition of oils, Colours of the Far North, at the Maslak-McLeod Gallery until Nov. 4.

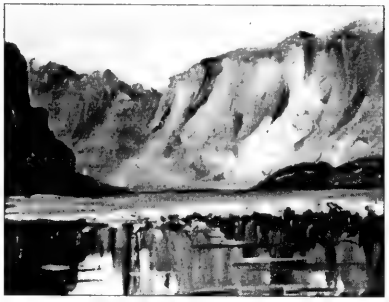
The Peterborough born, Forest Hill mother of four and grandmother of 10, is mesmerized by the sweeping scope of remote Arctic regions, the ever-changing light and the solitude. "I prefer cold places. I don't like the heat," she affirms.

When the children were young they were her in-house models, but once they had grown she began to look outside, literally, often returning to Peterborough to paint the countryside she knew so well. She would also set up her easel closer in at Holland Landing, the Rouge or Scarborough Bluffs.

She paints intuitive portraits, as well.

Ludwig has worked in warm climates such as Tuscany, Crete, Mexico – but the north pulls her, and she has found her way to the Antarctic.

Whenever possible, she sketches and paints outdoors during the Arctic "summer" from mid-June to mid-August, when the temperature can hover around zero.



Towering cliffs above floes.

Ludwig likes to work alone throughout the day. "I don't socialize until nighttime," she says.

She marvels at massive bergs which can be many storeys in height and stretch for miles. In the open, there is no way to judge relative distance or size because there is nothing for comparison.

The small paintings which she does on site help her to recapture the scenes truthfully on large canvases when she returns to her Toronto studio.

Included in the current solo exhibition are works from Baffin Island, the Northwest Territories and Greenland – riveting icebergs scalloped by wind and sun; towering cliffs above floes reflected in water; tiny fishing boats clustered around a wharf in an Inuit village; the school "bus," a kamatuk or sled which brings in youngsters from outlying homes.

Ludwig also focuses on a ship which comes to Pond Inlet, Pangnirtung and other isolated communities just once a year, generally in August, carrying provisions.

The crew unloads the supplies with the utmost speed, perhaps a day or two at each stop, eager to move on before the water can freeze and lock them in until the following summer!

Colour in the Far North, a solo exhibition by Margaret Florence Ludwig at the Maslak-McLeod Gallery, 25 Prince Arthur Ave., 12-5 p.m. Gallery hours: 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., closed Sundays. Phone, 416-944-2577, ww.maslakmcleod.com.

Film shows Czernowitz Jews as shadows of former selves

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Czernowitz, a centre of Bukovinian Jewry before World War II and the birthplace of poet Paul Celan, has been cursed by geography, having been ruled by the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Romania, Germany, the Soviet Union and, now, Ukraine.

Throughout the centuries, shifting borders affected its Jewish population, but never more so than during the Romanian, German and Soviet occupations.

In collaboration with the pro-German Romanian government, the Nazi occupiers murdered tens of thousands of Jews. Later, in the post-war period, the Soviets tried to crush Jewish culture. Whenever possible, Jews emigrated.

Today, the Jewish community of Czernowitz is but a pale shadow of its former self, judging by Volker Koepp's poignant two-hour documentary, Mr. Zwilling and Mrs. Zuckerman.

The film will be screened at the Art Gallery of Ontario on Oct. 29, at 5:15 p.m. and again at 7:45 p.m. It is presented by the Goethe-Institut in league with the Toronto Jewish Film Society and Holocaust Education Week.

Unfolding in a series of vignettes, Koepp's movie focuses on two elderly residents of Czernowitz who share a friendship and an affinity for the German language. Matthias Zwilling is a science teacher, while Rosa Zuckerman teaches English and German.

The pair reminisce about old Czernowitz and their families and then recall the terror of the Holocaust: the deportations to the Transnistria concentration camp and the murder of Jews by the Einsatzgruppen.

Koepp also introduces another survivor, Rosa Lieberman, a resident of a nearby village and its sole remaining Jew. The camera follows her to an overgrown Jewish cemetery where, in a touching scene, she mourns at her father's weathered headstone.

The film takes us to a synagogue during Purim, a Jewish school where about half the students are of mixed parentage, and a Jewish health clinic where medication is liberally dispensed.

It's hard to tell whether the Jews of Czernowitz have a good future, but it's clear that times are exceedingly rough. Zwilling and Zuckerman have not received their meagre pensions in months. It is a hand-to-mouth existence.

Michelle Polak

It was Cheryl Kallman, Polak's aunt, calling from a kibbutz in northern Israel, near the Lebanese border.

"That's the way things go in Israel," Polak said. "I remember phoning my aunt during the Gulf War and she was playing Scrabble with a gas mask on. Even during a war people will have babies and life will go on."

For Polak, it was a symbol of the dedication and determination of women to carry on despite any difficulty.

She sees the same kind of values in the women in the play she is now appearing in, The Daughters of Sheherzad, at Artword Theatre, 75 Portland St., (416-408-2783) until Nov. 5. In the play, she is a Polish Jewish girl of 16 consigned to a brothel by the Nazis. She tells her story along with five other women from different historical periods.

One of the women has been criminally abused by her husband and another is a Persian penalized for unveiling herself in the 19th century.

The inspiration is the experience of Sheherazade in A Thousand and One Arabian Nights, who won her freedom by enthralling the King during nights of storytelling.

The starting point for the play, created and directed by Iranian playwright Soheil Parso, is the Montreal massacre by Marc Lepine on Dec. 6, 1989, of 14 women engineering students at the École Polytechnique .

Polak is not convinced that things are any better for women in Canada since the Lepine massacre.

"Our play is a timeless piece whose purpose is to find out why women are considered such a threat to people like Lepine. It is not anti-male. We are aware that it is a dark subject, but it has lighter touches that come from the intimate details of the women's lives."

For Polak, who is from Montreal but graduated from the Toronto Ryerson Theatre school, acting in this play is the most important event that has ever happened to her.

"I'm on stage for 2½ hours, helping to tell other people's stories as well as my own, and I'm still trying to find an excuse for staying on the stage even during intermission."

Polak, who was a student at St. George's private high school in Montreal, said the Lepine massacre was a defining point in her life.

She went to the funeral despite an order from school authorities that no students should attend.

As a Jew, she said playing the part of the Polish girl abused by the Nazis "brings a special intense feeling to the part."

This is especially true because she had heard stories from her grandfather about how his whole family in Amsterdam was wiped out during World War II. Her grandfather was bicycling nearby when his family was picked up. He was sent to a work camp. Eventually he came to Canada with Polak's father, Edward, who was five at the time.

If you are 50-plus, you are probably familiar with the following question: "Where were you in November 1963, when President John F. Kennedy was killed?"

The Edelstein family, owners of the Lido Hotel and Spa in Miami remember it well.

That same day marked the opening of the Lido on the Venetian Causeway in Florida. They had three guests. Over the years, the hotel has become so popular that its filled to capacity at the height of the season. The facility accommodates 200 people.

A family affair, Chuck Edelstein and his son, Craig, a third generation Edelstein, run the hotel. "Canadians love us," Chuck Edelstein says. "Even now with the difference in dollars, 20 to 30 percent of our clientele hails from Canada.."

The Edelsteins refer to the Lido as a "destination spa". A daily car service is available from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. within a 50-block radius. A multiplicity of municipal golf and tennis courts are minutes away and South Beach and other scenic spots make life interesting.

Keeping in shape through massages, body wraps, yoga, aerobics, and tasty non-fattening meals is the big draw at the Lido.

Catering to a Jewish clients, the Lido Spa holds traditional Shabbat dinners and celebrates customs and ceremonies connected with Chanukah and other holidays.

NEW BOOK BY ERNA PARIS AT BOOKS & BAGELS

Toronto author Erna Paris has just published Long Shadow: Truth, Lies and History, her sixth book of non-fiction. It examines how various countries choose to remember or not remember their own histories.

The book, which took Paris 3½ years to write and research, has just come off Knopf Canada's presses. Earlier this month, it was published in translation in Germany under the title Understanding the Past. "The Germans were the first to buy it – in outline," Paris said.

The book is also due for publication in the United States, Britain and other Commonwealth countries next spring. And the author says it will be the basis of a four-part TV series produced by Toronto-based Sleeping Giant Productions, which will air in Canada on Vision TV.

Paris subdivided her topic into three areas: first, how Japan, Germany and France confront the legacy of World War II; second, how blacks and whites in South Africa and the southern United States handle memory and racial issues; and third, how the Serbs and others deal with issues of history and identity, especially involving the Holocaust.

Paris, who travelled to Germany, France, the former Yugoslavia, Japan, South Africa and the southern United States to research Long Shadow, says she "set out to meet and talk to a lot of ordinary people, not just the leaders… I wanted to speak with the victims in particular, the people who have been left out of the narratives of their countries."

However, while touring a village near Sarajevo where Croats had massacred Muslims in 1993, she and her guide were accosted and almost attacked. "I was very frightened – and I became even more frightened after I realized how upset my guide had been," she said.

In all, researching the book gave her "many extraordinary, marvelous experiences in unusual places."

She reads from Long Shadow at a Books & Bagels gathering, Oct. 29, 11 a.m. Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. Members free, non-members $8 (includes coffee and bagels). 416-924-6211.

Paris also speaks on Memory and Forgetfulness – How Nations Shape Their Past. Jewish Book Fair, Leah Posluns Theatre, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, Nov. 6, 8:30 p.m.

Mixed Media artist expresses creativity with glass designs

One of Fern Kagan's designs.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Mixed media artist and writer, Fern Kagan, believes creative therapy and self-expression are extremely important to mental health and overall well-being.

"I believe that art is a tool for self discovery," says the 35-year-old artist, whose works can be seen at exhibitions at upper-scale malls such as Bayview Village and Yorkdale, at crafts shows – including One of a Kind and Signatures – and in various gift stores and galleries in Toronto and southern United States.

Kagan is the creator of hand-painted decorative designs on glass. She explained to The CJN her process, which requires painting on the reverse side of the glass.

"You have to think backwards," says Kagan, whose fashion plates have a playful look, with many of them portraying fashionable women wearing colourful clothes, jewelry and flowing hair.

The plates and other items, which are primarily decorative, can be personalized for birthdays, anniversaries or other occasions. "I make unique gifts for unique people for unique occasions," she says.

Kagan was born in Toronto and attended Newtonbrook Secondary School and York University, where she majored in philosophy with a minor in psychology.

She learned much about art from her father, Michael Kagan, who is a visual artist, and her uncle Hillel Kagan, a professional artist.

"I have been interested in colour and design since I was a child. I guess you could say we are an artistic family," she says.

Her ambition was to be a writer. Six years ago, Kagan moved to Natchez, Miss., where her poems were published in a poetry anthology. While there, she frequently wrote for U.S. magazines.

She continues her writing career today as a regular contributor to Eye for the Future, a magazine for personal development, psychology, natural health and nutrition.

But it was in Natchez that Kagan was inspired to try the medium of painting on glass. "I saw some painted wineglasses which were beautiful. I began experimenting with methods of working with the glass," she says.

When she returned to Toronto two years ago, Kagan threw herself into her new venture and, by word of mouth, she has developed a following for her many glass accessories: wineglasses, mugs, clocks, coasters, vases and other colourful and creative pieces.

People began seeing her pieces; friends told friends, and soon customers were sending customers. Last year, during the Signatures craft show, she appeared as a guest on Breakfast Television.

"My approach is primarily experimental," says Kagan. "I learn through combining different mediums and colours. I get inspired by colour and texture and shapes."

She is an abstract artist, she adds, by temperament and inclination. "I want to find a way to meld all of my passions and interests into one expression. I am open to different ways of exploring creativity."

The point of searching, says Kagan, is "to become fully utilized as a person so that all of your capabilities and talents find a place in the world." To this end, she enjoys using mixed media, which is fun for "combining two things that don't go together and making them fit.

"It is like solving a mathematical equation," she says.

She believes the best way to learn art is to watch an artist at work. "I learned from watching my father, and I've had some very good mentors – people I admired – and I've been inspired by them."

Kagan will be at Signatures Craft Show, from Nov. 24 to Dec. 3, at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, where some 300 artists will be exhibiting their crafts.

Kagan works by appointment only. Call her at 416-223-4037.

First-class mystery develops over play's author

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A first-class mystery has developed regarding the author of Poor Ostrich, a play about Jews in Berlin between 1913 and 1938.

The play, which is being presented by Medina Theatre as part of Holocaust Education Week has never been done before in Canada. It was discovered by Medina's former president, Fran Elliot, in a little volume of four plays at the Holy Blossom Temple library.

"The author of Poor Ostrich, published in England in 1948, is listed as Hemro, but I've been unable to find out whether Hemro is a man or woman, or an anagram for the real author," said Elliot.

Elliot has been script searching for Medina for 14 years and has never before come across a play whose author is unknown.

"As soon as I read [the play] I became excited because it has a message for the new generation who do not know why the Holocaust happened, and I had only two weeks left to meet the deadline for submitting a play for Education Week," Elliot said.

In its staged reading, Medina members reveal that upper middle-class Jews in Berlin at that time had their heads in the sand, downplaying their Jewishness.

But they had a foreboding sense of the trouble to come as they learned that their children were not even being allowed to swim at school with their classmates because they were Jewish.

"Oh, that Hitler fellow. We'll be over it soon," one character says.

Film shows persistence pays for former slave labourers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Last July, after two years of gruelling negotiations, the German government and a group of German companies finally ratified a historic $7.5 billion compensation package for about one million forced labourers who were almost worked to death during the long, dark reign of Nazism.

Rudy Kennedy, a German Jew born in Silesia, was one of those condemned, hapless labourers. He worked for the conglomerate I.G. Farben in two concentration camps – Auschwitz/Buna and Dora – from 1943 onward in unspeakable conditions.

For years after settling in Britain and becoming a successful businessman, Kennedy tried to forget his ordeal. But four years ago, doubtless spurred on by the Swiss bank scandal, he launched a personal crusade to secure compensation from I.G. Farben, a key cog in Nazi Germany's war effort.

The story of his struggle is related in I Was A Slave Labourer, a British documentary to be broadcast on TVOntario Wednesday Nov. 1 at 10 p.m., and again Sunday Nov. 5 at midnight.

Kennedy, whose mother and sister perished in the Holocaust, was motivated less by hatred than by a burning desire for historical justice.

Treated like sandpaper, to be used and discarded, Kennedy sought a pension from I.G. Farben. Rebuffed by that company, he and a coterie of former slave labourers hired a lawyer. She, in turn, hit Germany with a class-action suit that finally paid dividends.

In the film, directed by Luke Holland, Kennedy is portrayed as a diffident but persistent crusader who won't take no for an answer.

He visits a former I.G. Farben executive at his home in the Alps. The encounter, though civil, is fraught with tension.

Pushing on, Kennedy walks into an I.G. Farben shareholders' meeting. There he talks with a man who unequivocally condemns Nazi crimes, and delivers an impassioned speech.

Subsequently, Kennedy visits the headquarters of BASF, one of many German firms that employed forced workers.

After hiring the young American lawyer who will handle their case in U.S. courts, Kennedy says, "We have the will but not the knowledge [to proceed]."

From here, this intriguing film follows Kennedy to the German embassy in London, where he leaves a petition; to Paris, where he enlists the support of fellow Holocaust survivors; to Washington, where he attends a survivors' meeting; and to New York City, where he appears on the 60 Minutes television show.

By the time I Was A Slave Labourer ends, Kennedy has won the battle. Germany, in league with complicit companies like I.G. Farben, has agreed to settle the case.

Persistence pays.

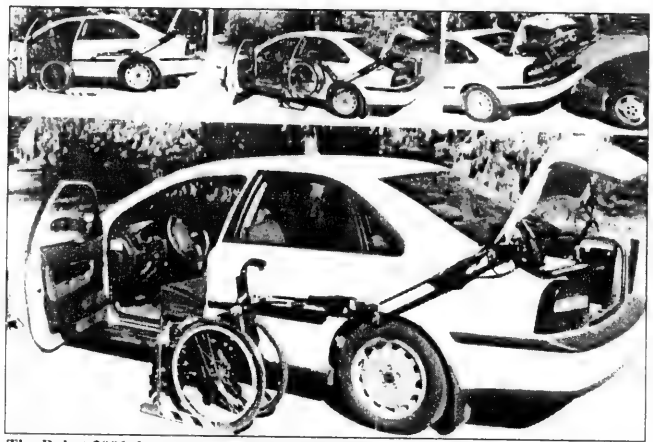
Israeli technology aids those wheelchair-bound



The Robot 2001 demonstrated above makes life much easier for the handicapped.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — New technology developed in Israel can help people who use wheelchairs get around more easily.

The Robot 2001, manufactured by TMN Devices Ltd. in Rosh HaAyn, allows a wheelchair to be stored in the trunk of a car using a device already installed there.

The person gets out of his or her wheelchair beside the driver's door and gets into the car. At the touch of a button operated and controlled by a microprocessor, the trunk opens, a mechanical "arm" comes out to lift the wheelchair into it, and the trunk closes.

When he or she is ready to get out of the car, a touch of the same button opens the trunk, the wheelchair is deposited beside the driver's seat, and the device is returned to the trunk.

Susan Lutzeier, of the Ontario March of Dimes, told The CJN that the Robot 2001 has many advantages over earlier technology, which could only be used in a van or minivan, and required such adaptations to the vehicle as a lowered floor.

She said the Robot 2001 allows a person with physical disabilities to drive a regular car, "which in these days is much more economically viable than a van, especially considering the price of gas."

It is not even necessary to find an especially large parking space, she said.

Also, the robot can be easily moved and installed into another car.

The Ontario March of Dimes' Home and Vehicle Modification Program provides funding for physically challenged Ontario residents to modify homes, cars and buildings so that they can live independently, or as independently as possible, and get around more easily.

These modifications include such things as widening doors, adapting steering controls in cars and installing lifts.

Another March of Dimes program offers technologically skilled volunteers who will design and build, if necessary, one-of-a-kind products that cannot be purchased.

Two such inventions have been a cutting board with pegs to attach to a counter, and a wheelchair brush that can be used to clean off the chair's wheels and sides in bad weather.

For more information on Robot 2001, contact the distributor, KINO Mobility Inc., 416-635-5873, toll free 888-495-4455, or the Ontario March of Dimes, 1-877-369-4867. The Web site is www.dimes.on.ca.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I know that many people suffer from peanut allergies, but for those of us who don't, aren't they a great food?

A. Yes, they are. Peanuts are a great food because they are packed with healthful, high-energy nutrients. One ounce of roasted peanuts contains 165 calories, 14 grams of fat (however, only two are saturated, 12 grams are healthful monounsaturated fat), three grams of fibre, seven grams of protein, as well as a dose of phosphorus and potassium. While they are high in fat and calories, a small serving will go a long way in staving off hunger and giving you many healthy nutrients.

Q. I love olives, but have often been told that they are very fattening. Is this true?

A. I agree olives are delicious. While they do have more fat than most vegetables, they don't stack up too badly. Approximately five medium sized olives (black or green) contain less than 30 calories and two grams of fat, none of which is saturated.

Poor Ostrich has a timely message

Poor Ostrich also has its humorous moments, particularly in the first episode, which takes place at a grand ball where everyone is having a good time.

"It's a play with a timely message for today because as Jews we are in a dangerous situation," said Morris Jacobs, Medina's vice-president, one of the 14 performers along with Elliot.

"There is a case of intermarriage, with the husband, a non-Jew, under terrific pressure to renounce his wife, which he never does," said Jacobs.

"The German Jews of that time, particularly in the first episode, Diagnosis, were more interested in discussing the German economy and their resentment against the countries who defeated Germany in World War I. They decried what inflation was doing to their lives."

Jacobs plays Herbert Levinsky, head of one of the three Jewish families described in the play. It is outside his apartment building that the Gestapo show up to take him away as the play ends.

Poor Ostrich will be presented free on Oct. 30 at 8 p.m. at the B'nai Brith building, 15 Hove St.

Boxer was armed forces welterweight champion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Albert "Al" Roher was always a fighter, from his early days on the mean streets of Toronto to his exploits as golden gloves champion of the Canadian Army, even to the end of his days when he battled a variety of illnesses that would have claimed a lesser man much earlier.

Albert "Al" Roher

In the end, Roher's fighting spirit couldn't sustain him. He died recently after a lengthy illness at age 82.

Perhaps not as well known as his contemporaries, Norman "Baby" Yak and Sammy Luftspring, he was nevertheless cut from the same cloth and, like them, was a boxing champion.

Roher experienced a hard scrabble youth in Depression-era Toronto, selling papers downtown, enduring anti-Semitic taunts from local toughs and developing a devastating punch in response. A rock-hard fighter who backed down from no one, Roher became welterweight champion of the Canadian Army from 1941 to '42 and captained the Canadian team that defeated Allied fighters in wartime boxing competitions. While in England, Roher won a non-title fight versus the British welterweight champ in the 10th round.

Roher's career and life experiences hark back to a day much different than that experienced by today's well-fed and pampered Canadians.

Life was hard and Roher thought nothing of fighting two or three times a day. Even after his boxing career ended, he took care of business, first as a doorman at the Metropole Hotel and later at his own restaurant and tavern, the Diplomat, at Dufferin and Wilson.

"He was a street kid who grew up downtown," recalled his daughter, Ruthie.

Roher was in plenty of fights, not all of them sanctioned boxing events. When he was working at the Metropole, one "guest" commented that "the Jew bastard never served" in the army.

"He was there 4½ years and hospitalized," said his son, Steve. "I think he broke the guy's jaw, he was so angry."

Prior to his military career, Roher followed his good friend and former Canadian welterweight champion, Sammy Luftspring, who also died recently, to New York to train with boxing's best fighters. In 1940, he returned to Toronto and decided to join the armed forces.

He and a friend took a streetcar to a downtown armory where they were faced with large lineups at the air force and navy tables. They chose instead the shortest line and Roher became a member of the 48th Scottish Highlanders.

The unit was not exactly a haven from anti-Semitism. "No one called him 'dirty Jew' especially after he knocked out a lippy anti-Semitic soldier and rendered him senseless for three-quarters of an hour," The CJN reported in a July 1979 story.

Roher told The CJN at the time that relations were better after that. "Mostly, I was respected because I soldiered the same as anyone else. I never dogged it."

Roher saw action in Sicily in 1943 and was wounded in the leg, an injury that never healed completely.

After the war he returned to Canada and considered a professional boxing career, but that idea was nixed by his wife, Helen, whom he had married shortly before going overseas.

"It was the only regret he had, that he didn't compete as a professional," Steve said. "He was a power puncher. He had power in both hands. He used short punches. He was actual dynamite. I've seen my dad in action. The boxer I'd compare him to is Joe Frazier."

Back in civilian life, Roher mixed with an eclectic and colourful crowd, guys who sported such nicknames as "The Brain," "Papa Lulu," "Hushy" and "Panko."

On one occasion at the Metropole, a simmering feud between a wrestler and a top-ranked boxer – the great white hope of the day – threatened to turn into a brawl in the hotel lobby. When he told the two troublemakers to take it outside, "the boxer went to throw a punch and dad blocked him and threw one back and knocked him out. 'Timber, there goes the great white hope'," one observer said.

While the public knew about his tough side, to his friends and family, Roher was a warm, gentle, considerate and loving man. Steve recalls that around Christmas, his father would have the chef at the Diplomat prepare turkey dinners that they would deliver by car.

"Dad told me these are proud people but we'll never tell anyone who we give these dinners to," he recalled.

"He was a wonderful family man. He loved his wife dearly," said Sol Freeman, a longtime friend. "I knew him as a standup guy, respected among the general population. He stood up for what he thought was right."

Tough on the outside, "he was the sweetest man. He was good to his children and he had millions of friends," Steve said.

Roher was a member of the General Wingate Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion and was saluted by an honour guard before being laid to rest.

He is survived by his wife Helen, children Joel and Judy Roher of Florida, Steve and Jane Roher of Vancouver, daughter Ruthie, Sam and Linda Roher, his brother Nathan and sisters Ruth, Rose and Bessie.

...orah-ed with Trudeau

...ill you scream if you read yet another ...ty reminiscence about some personal ...counter with Pierre Elliott Trudeau? Too ...d.

I never really met Trudeau one-on-one. ...photographed him once ...lose up with a long lens, resulting in cheek-bones and eyes even more pronounced than nature had made them.

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

But I partied with him once. Me, and about 100 other people, and some grubby, freeloading press types.

It was 1981 or '82. I was young, thinner and working about 80 hours a week at a local weekly newspaper in Montreal. The rumour was that the PM was coming to a suburban Cote St. Luc synagogue to help the mayor get re-elected. (The municipality was in his riding). This was supposed to be hush-hush but a visit from the prime minister, especially Trudeau, couldn't be kept secret for too long.

I informed the only other reporter at the paper, and we set out – cameras, tape recorders and note pads on guard – on a bleak, cold November night, staking out the mayor's house. An hour or so after we pulled up outside the cordon, he emerged, unmistakable in a hat pulled down rakishly over one eye and in a trench coat that was pure Humphrey Bogart. If nothing else, Pierre Trudeau was cool. Not affectedly cool. Cool for real.

Off we careened, in advance of the motorcade, to the Beth Zion synagogue, where we were joined by a few other media hounds who had also twigged to Trudeau's visit. We sat ourselves down at one of several tables that had been set up for a party, and immediately incurred the wrath of an overworked press spokeswoman, who almost became hoarse telling us to get the you-know-what out.

But we stayed put, a bit jumpy that very large RCMP guards would soon take matters into their own hands. For some reason, they didn't. We nervously sipped our drinks, and waited.

When Pierre Trudeau walked into the room, so did a rush of energy. The beautiful young blonde perched on his arm – almost a head taller than he was – didn't hurt either. Applause and cheers filled the room.

By this time, the press woman wasn't kidding. We must leave. We just must. This was not open to the media!

Suddenly, my colleague tugged my sleeve. "Let's go ask Trudeau if we can stay," he said.

"Are you nuts?" I responded. "You can't just walk up to the prime minister of Canada and ask to stay at a private party." Boy, was I defeatist.

"C'mon," he urged.

And away we went, sauntering right up to the man, whose every word was being hung on by the rapturous women at his table. In those days, protection of the prime minister was minimal; a senior RCMP officer once told me that it was Brian Mulroney who doubled his protection after an incident in which his wife's hair was mussed by a protest placard. But I digress...

"Prime Minister," my colleague pronounced without a shred of hesitation, "your press people are telling us to leave, and we want to stay and party."

Bingo. He said the right word. Party.

Trudeau didn't blink, and even delivered one of his patented shrugs.

"Well," he intoned dryly, "If you just want to party, I suppose you can stay."

His media people had been watching the exchange. As we walked away triumphant, we felt their dagger stares.

And we stayed, and danced the horah with Pierre Trudeau until the wee hours. He never broke a sweat, never missed a step.

When I heard he had died, I felt old for the first time in my life.

About Seniors

Dr. Mark says...

Is aging a disease, or is it simply a normal stage of life? And what does chronological age tell us?

For a population, it tells us a great deal, but for the individual, it tells us much less indeed. This is because as a group, the elderly are biologically very heterogeneous, much more so than their younger cohorts. We express our intuitive understanding of this fact when we say that someone "looks much younger (or older) than her stated age." Would one so commonly express such a notion for the typical 30-year-old?

Kidney function can serve as an example. Considered as a group, the mean function of a human kidney (either right or left) decreases as we age. Yet, as studies have shown, although the functioning of some organs declines with age, some will maintain the same level into old age. Others will even show some improvement with time.

Despite individual exceptions, however, organ systems show some deterioration with age. These declines result in a gradual loss of physiological reserve, so that in the end, the total organism loses its ability to cope with biological stress. For example, infection with the same influenza strain that might make a typical 30-year-old take to bed for 72 hours can very possibly kill a nonagenarian.

But what about disease? It also kills, but is it synonymous with age? The answer to this age-old (and still not adequately answered) question is both yes and no.

No, because many diseases affect younger persons preferentially (e.g. infectious mononucleosis). No, because in the very elderly, it is often impossible, even after autopsy, to determine any obvious cause of death.

Yes, because certain diseases do become more common as we age. For instance, it seems that if dogs or men could live long enough, they would all develop an enlarged prostate. Other maladies, such as osteoporosis or heart disease, are commonly found among or are entirely restricted to "golden agers." At the same time, the good news is that mortality figures for the common 21st-century killers such as cancer and cardiovascular disease continue to decrease at all ages, and especially in the very elderly!

Despite all this, even as a geratrician I am still not always certain of the difference between disease and age. As we face the growing geriatric imperative, one of the challenges of modern medicine will be to try to explicate this difference. Whatever the outcome, as for my patients,

Toronto Stands Solidly Behind Israel

UJA FEDERATION and its affiliated organizations are vigorously reflecting the community's solidarity with Israel. The Canada Israel Committee condemned Canada's support for the recent United Nations resolution criticizing Israel's use of "excessive force."

At a briefing last week at the Lipa Green Building, Israel's Health Minister Roni Milo admitted to second thoughts about dealing with Yasser Arafat as a peace partner. "We are not sure at all that the Palestinians are going to fulfill this agreement," said Milo, referring to the recent Sharm-El Sheikh accord between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Milo also condemned the Palestinian Authority for "sacrificing children" in confrontations with Israel. "People cannot believe that children are being sent to be killed," he said. Milo came to Canada as a special envoy to update Prime Minister Chrétien and other Canadian political leaders about the crisis in Israel.

To keep the Jewish community informed about Israel's struggle, a series of special events, briefings and initiatives were also arranged, starting with the emergency Israel Solidarity Rally attended by 4000 people on October 11.

Israel's Health Minister Roni Milo

Another UJA FEDERATION initiative was an Israel Support-a-thon which gave donors to Campaign 2001- The Campaign For Our Children – the unique opportunity to place a five-minute personal solidarity call to family or friends in Israel last week. For those without someone to call, UJA FEDERATION provided names of individuals in Toronto's Partnership 2000 region of Eilat-Elot and elsewhere.

For information updates and links to major Israeli media reports, visit the UJA FEDERATION website at www.jewishtoronto.net.

Ringing Up Support

UJA FEDERATION leaders are urging community members to support Campaign 2001 - The Campaign For Our Children - as an expression of solidarity with Israel. "A gift to UJA FEDERATION is the way to make a powerful Jewish statement at a time in Israel's history when Jewish unity is so urgently required," said Judy Engel, who is Campaign Vice-Chair together with Harry Krakowsky.

Peter Ekstein, who along with Debbie Kimel and Carole Sterling are Telethon Chairs, is confident "response to the next telethon week, October 29 - November 2, will reflect our community's concern for and commitment to Israel." UJA FEDERATION, as a member of the worldwide Federation network, funds the Jewish Agency which is rescuing over 4000 Jews a month from the former Soviet Union to start new lives in Israel. In addition, UJA FEDERATION, through ourpartner organization UIA Federations Canada, supports dozens of projects to help Israelis cope with the current emergency.

Judy Engel

Telethon canvassers are set to call more than 9000 people who have not yet responded to the Campaign. With $29 million already raised, including $3 million in new gifts, the Campaign has reached nearly two-thirds of its overall $45 million goal.

For more information on upcoming telethons or to volunteer for a telethon shift, call Clare Adam at 416-635- 2883 ext. 184.

Through a distorted lens

Media coverage of Mideast events

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Israeli Health Minister Roni Milo visited Canada recently, he acknowledged part of his mission was to balance media coverage of the current hostilities by presenting the Israeli case to the Canadian public.

Israelis, he contended, believe they are getting a raw deal from the international media. Their reportage distorted the reality of the events and failed to examine the Palestinian motives for igniting the violence.

A dynamic speaker and a master of the television-friendly sound bite, Milo forcefully presented the Israeli point of view of the current situation.

Backgrounder

For seasoned observers of the Middle Eastern scene, Milo articulated what they see as the media's penchant for siding with the underdog in Middle East conflict situations.

Jewish media watchers contacted by The CJN believe the visuals of the conflict, in which enraged young Palestinians attack well-armed Israeli soldiers, lends itself to superficial treatment, with the media favoring the underdog Palestinians. Furthermore, they say, the day's news as presented on television often resembles the final score of a sports match, but with a body count taking the place of goals for and against.

From Rubin Friedman's vantage point as national communications director of Canadian Jewish Congress, "the [Canadian] print media has been much better than the electronic. The electronic media is dominated by the need to present dramatic images."

The print media, with some exceptions, has been far better at presenting a "more balanced" description of events. In particular, Op-Ed pieces have tended to go into more detail and given a context for current hostilities, he said.

Floods soak Tel Aviv

Torrents of rain fell on Israel last week. In South Tel Aviv (see accompanying photos) flooding was so heavy that residents had to be rescued by small boats. One youngster from Jaffa was reported swept away to his death. Despite the hardship, one salutary effect of the flooding was to have put a damper on the violence initiated by the Tanzim militia of the PLO, in low lying regions of the West Bank. [Israel and Israel Sun photo]

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC Blasts MPP

TORONTO — The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress has blasted NDP MPP Peter Kormos for attending a recent pro-Palestinian rally at which comparisons between Nazism and Israel were prevalent. "We must ask whether you feel it appropriate to involve yourself in a protest where such outrageous and hateful claims [were] featured," CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy recently wrote to Kormos. Congress has requested a reply.

Rally for Israel

ST. CATHARINES — Over 100 members of this city's Jewish community last week gathered for a rally of support for Israel. "Show your support strongly, in any way possible," urged Zehavit Ben Hillel, Israel's vice-consul in Toronto. Also addressing the rally, held at Congregation B'nai Israel, was Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress, who said Canadian Jews feel "abandoned" by the federal government's support for a United Nations resolution that condemned Israel.

Combatting Racism

TORONTO — Nominations are open for the Canadian Race Relations Foundation's Award of Excellence, which recognizes public, private or voluntary organizations whose efforts represent excellence and innovation in combatting racism in Canada. Award winners and the top 25 nominees will be invited to an awards gala and symposium in Vancouver next March. For details, call 416-952-5019 or toll-free at 1-888-240-4936.

ISRAEL

'Tech Warfare'

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah is accusing Israelis and Americans of deliberately causing its Web site to crash by bombarding it with hits. The group's Webmaster said he has the names of more than 8,500 servers, mainly in Israel and the United States, that have been hitting his site regularly. "This is Israeli technological warfare," he said.

WORLD

Soldiers to Israel

NEW YORK — Thirty-six U.S. Jewish soldiers and military personnel under the age of 27 will go on a free 10-day trip to Israel this December on a project called Operation Birthright Israel. While Birthright Israel has sent more than 10,000 Jewish young adults to Israel in the past year, this will be the first trip organized specifically for Jews in the U.S. military.

Jews Get Hearing

PRAGUE — Germany has granted a hearing to Slovakia's Jewish community, which is trying to reclaim millions of dollars the wartime Slovak government allegedly stole to pay the Nazis to deport tens of thousands of Jews to concentration camps. The Slovakian Jewish community will make its case in a Berlin court next spring. The group claims up to $3.9 million was paid to Germany by the Nazi-puppet Slovak state. In 1942, 57,800 Slovak Jews were deported to concentration camps. All but a handful were murdered.

Flatow Scholarship

RIVER EDGE, N.J. — Scholarship applications are now available for the 2001-2002 academic year for those planning to spend a year studying in Israel. The Alisa Flatow Memorial Scholarship Fund was established by the family of the late Alisa Flatow, a New Jersey native who was killed in a terrorist attack in Kfar Darom, Israel, in 1995. She was spending the year studying Judaism in Israel. Applications are available only from the group's Web site at www.alisafund.org. The deadline is Feb. 12, 2001.

Evening of Prayer

NEW YORK — L'mann B'nos Yisrael International is urging synagogues worldwide to take part in a community Tehillim Tfillah evening on Nov. 8, which corresponds to the anniversary of Rachel's death. The New York-based, volunteer organization, which is dedicated to helping the plight of agunot, will also arrange to have the names of agunot, women trying to get pregnant, those who are ill, and those looking for a match, read at Rachel's tomb. For information or to have a name added to the list, call 718-338-0833 or fax 212-727-9526, attention Kever Rochel Program.

Bomb Blast

JOHANNESBURG — A bomb that exploded outside the offices of a South African opposition party may be related to the crisis in the Middle East. The party's Jewish leader, Tony Leon, had blasted the governing African National Congress for siding with Palestinians.

Doug Christie Backs Stockwell Day

The Calgary Sun said some will call it a kiss of death.

But that hasn't stopped Doug Christie from publicly endorsing Day.

Christie, the self-styled defender of free speech and lawyer to Holocaust deniers Jim Keegstra, Ernst Zundel and Malcolm Ross, said last week that Day is the best choice for prime minister.

"We'll support the Alliance" he told the Sun. "There is no other alternative for western Canadians."

Christie is planning to host an election rally in an Edmonton auditorium on Nov. 18, 20 years after the separatist Western Canada Concept, which Christie helped found, packed the same venue. It's not known whether Day has been invited.

"Stockwell is a guy who's got every conceivable advantage," Christie was quoted as saying. "Stockwell's got charm, intelligence, wit, he's bilingual. The only thing he's not is bisexual.

"Given time, Stockwell could become an invincible force. The majority of people agree with his values, his morals, and he hasn't kicked people out of the party."

Support for Israel emerging as election issue

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Jean Chrétien's Liberals have felt the wrath of Canadian Jewry.

The government has responded by reaching out to Jews, trying to dampen their anger and soothe feelings of betrayal.

Election 2000
Analysis

But will it be enough?

Will the government's efforts at spin control following its support of the Oct. 7 resolution at the United Nations that condemned Israel be sufficient to limit a potential backlash against Liberal candidates in ridings with large Jewish populations? Will such Liberal stalwarts as Elinor Caplan, Jim Peterson and Art Eggleton be in trouble come Nov. 27?

Not in recent memory has the Jewish community been so incensed at the government as with Canada's support for the motion before the UN Security Council that slammed Israel for "excessive use of force" in its clashes with Palestinians.

Three backbench Liberal MPs, Joe Volpe, Carolyn Bennett and Montreal's Irwin Cotler, even broke with their party to denounce Canada's vote.

Ottawa has endorsed anti-Israel resolutions before at the UN, but its support for this motion came at a time of particularly high passions.

In rallies across the country, full-throttled support for Israel has been sounded, just as Canada has been resoundingly booed for its stance – by the very people who have traditionally formed a bulwark of Liberal votes.

Suddenly, Canada's hitherto balanced role in the Middle East has become a federal election issue. And candidates are taking notice.

For example, no sooner had the new foreign minister, John Manley, been sworn in, than he flew to Toronto on the first morning of the campaign for a meeting at Caplan's riding office with about 30 Jewish communal leaders.

(Last Thursday, Manley defended Canada's UN vote, saying it does not change Ottawa's policy of trying to get both sides back to the negotiating table. A "fundamental cornerstone" of that policy, Manley added, is the right of Israel to exist "behind secure borders.")

Joining Manley and Caplan were Eggleton and Willowdale MP Peterson, a secretary of state. That's four cabinet ministers getting an earful, with words like "betrayal" and "pain," from Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen, Prof. Irving Abella, several rabbis, and representatives from B'nai Brith Canada. They were joined by high-profile Jewish Liberals Hershel Ezrin, Les Scheininger and former Toronto MP Barry Campbell.

The atmosphere in the room "was so tense, you could have cut it with a knife," remarked one participant. Caplan was left clearly shaken by the meeting, and in a comment to The CJN, attempted to deflect criticism of the government by saying the vote "reflected the growing irrelevance of the United Nations." All three Toronto-area Grits said they received many angry calls from constituents.

This was after Chrétien himself, in an Oct. 17 meeting with the leaders of Canada's main Jewish organizations, appointed his chief foreign policy adviser as a direct liaison with the Jewish community in an effort to head off future problems (CJN, Oct. 26). Jewish leaders agree the prime minister was out of the loop when the UN vote was taken, but generally, have cut him little slack.

And last week in Vancouver, more attempts to placate Jewish voters: Chrétien revealed that he has been asked to engage in talks with the leaders of Israel, the Palestinian Authority and several Arab nations. He said Canada "is urging everyone to get back to the negotiating table. It is the only solution. Otherwise, they will have violence for a long time. We are trying to play a role."

Chrétien ducked a question on whether Canada's UN

The dominant stories

From the editor's desk

Most Jewish Canadians should be fully engaged in the current of important events unfolding all around us these days. Only someone stuck in self-denying or self-absorbed, existential slumber could be indifferent to the news, and in particular to the two stories dominating headlines.

- A federal election campaign is in full swing across Canada, with politicians from all five parties competing for the "affections" of Canadian voters.
- A renewed Palestinian campaign of mayhem and murder is in full swing across the West Bank, Gaza and in parts of Israel with the leaders of the Palestinian Authority competing for the "affections" of the western television viewer.

The obligation and the promise of The CJN is to provide the best possible coverage of these events within the scope of our resources, in addition of course to our regular coverage of the news that reflects the rich, diverse life of the Canadian Jewish community. But because our space is limited, our coverage too must necessarily be limited.

For this reason I want to set out for CJN readers our intentions regarding coverage of these major stories.

* * *

Including this one, there will be four issues of The CJN prior to the election on Nov. 27.

In today's CJN, staff reporter Ron Csillag provides an introductory, "wrap-around," a general analysis of the key issues, candidates and ridings of special interest to the community.

In subsequent papers of Nov. 9, 16 and 23, CJN correspondents from across the country will provide profiles of the ridings in which there are significant Jewish demographic interests.

We are also trying to obtain interviews with the leaders of the parties.

It is our unwavering commitment to provide our readers the best information we can, albeit in unavoidably condensed form, concerning the men and women vying for their votes.

* * *

Israel's current struggle is nothing less than a struggle for its right to exist as a Jewish state in the Muslim Middle East. This characterization is not an exaggeration, nor is it overly dramatic. It springs directly from Yasser Arafat's abject refusals to acknowledge any legitimacy in Israel's right of sovereignty to the Kotel or to abate the violence and the torrent of hatred he unleashed towards Israelis and Jews.

Nothing, absolutely nothing, is more important to The CJN than Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state in the Muslim Middle East. Our coverage will reflect this.

We will publish news from our diverse sources that is as up-to-date as possible given our weekly publication schedule. We will also publish important analyses and commentaries generally unavailable to our readers from the general press.

Thus, I draw readers' attention to an editorial written by Amotz Asa-El in the Oct. 20 issue of the International Jerusalem Post. The editorial forcefully yet poignantly expresses the anguish and the determination that Israelis now feel about the peace process so demonically sabotaged by Yasser Arafat.

I reproduce excerpts of his editorial:

"Those of us who, by and large, supported the Oslo process through thick and thin, do not regret having done so. We would never have forgiven ourselves for having failed to exhaustively explore the opportunity that has now proven a charade. Yet now, that its collapse is as unequivocal as the ransacking of Joseph's Tomb, it is time to brace for war.

"A genuine peace negotiator cannot set the region ablaze…; he certainly cannot claim Judaism's holiest site isn't where the whole damn world knows it is – including by the way, the Pope and the Dalai Lama, who recently prayed there…

"In hindsight, we can say that this last-ditch performance of [Arafat's] was but the culmination of a dismal seven-year record…

"Arafat spoke to his people emphatically about suicide bombers; he taught hatred, bigotry and anti-Semitism to schoolchildren; he had his press, radio and TV incite against his ostensible peace partner; and he actively deflected Western efforts to invest in his realms, thereby preventing the creation of serious employment opportunities…

"This, coupled with Arafat's infamous record on human rights and freedom of speech, makes one wonder how a Western world… silently accepts it…

"Full peace means exposure to that intoxicating air of freedom, justice and mobility with which Israel, like the rest of the West, is laden. And that more than anything else makes us threatening to the Arab regimes… And that is also why a dictator like Arafat can't afford to strike a deal with us, a deal that would include a clause about ending the conflict…

"And that is also why we now realize that the time has come to fight…

"We Jews didn't build this country in order to be slaughtered in it, and when it comes down to that, the last thing we should care about is the enlightened world's cynical reprimands."

Asa-El is a moderate. But he is outraged. Once again, he faces imminent physical threat to his country, unbridled hatred from the enemy, and the déjà-vu hypocrisy from most of the West.

It falls to us to ensure that Asa-El and his countrymen will never have to face this iniquitous trio alone.

Travel to Israel down 30 percent in October

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadians are cancelling or postponing their trips to Israel in large numbers, putting the brakes on what was shaping up to be a record year for Canadian tourism to the Jewish state.

Crisis in Israel

El Al Israel Airlines, the Israel Government Tourism Office and a major tour operator are reporting that 30 percent of travellers have cancelled trips to Israel scheduled for October. They attribute the cancellations to the dramatic media coverage of the violence in the West Bank towns of Ramallah, Nablus and on the outskirts of Jerusalem – areas where few of their Canadian travellers visit.

Further putting a damper on Canadian travel is a "travel information report" issued by the Department of Foreign Affairs. It suggests "Canadians should not travel to east Jerusalem, (including the Old City), the West Bank and Gaza" and it states that "the risk of violence in other areas remains high."

El Al has responded to the October drop off with a move designed to nip in the bud any carry-over to November. Beginning on Nov. 1 and running to the end of the year, the airline has reduced its return fare to Israel to $999 from $1,327 – a 25 percent reduction. Travellers may also find bargains at Israeli hotels, which are also reducing their room rates in the wake of 33 percent vacancy figures.

In addition to the monetary impact the cancellations have had on the Israeli hospitality industry, Israeli society as a whole has suffered as well, said Taali Lester-Tollman, marketing and public relations manager for the Israel Government Tourism Office in Toronto.

"People in Israel are feeling isolated because Jews are not coming. I think they feel isolated in that the conception of Israel is a negative one. The economy was booming and tourism was booming with record years. Now they feel the void. It's heart-wrenching, right on the brink of peace."

Rami Fisher, general manager of El Al's Canadian operations, agrees the Israeli public is down in the dumps over recent developments. "The atmosphere is different, people are feeling depressed," he said.

Nevertheless, life is fairly normal in most of the country. "You can still walk in the country and everything is functioning normally. There is no reason not to go. But I understand. People are scared based on what they see on TV."

> 'People are scared based on what they see on TV'

Ehud Telem, president and owner of Peerless Travel, said he has continued to send tour groups to Israel, though "we've had a few cancellations of church groups and individuals" heading to Israel to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot). "The majority have postponed their trips, they didn't cancel them.

"We tried to convince people it's safe, even though the media is putting things out of proportion. There is no doubt there are clashes in the West Bank and Gaza. They're not anywhere in Israel. Israel had one bad day when the Israeli Arabs were enticed by people from the West Bank to protest in a violent way. That's over."

Telem, who expects to book about 10,000 visitors to Israel this year, maintained "there's no security problem travelling anywhere in Israel," including towns with large Arab populations.

"The Western Wall, the Old City are safe and secure. It's perfectly safe for travel," he said.

Some Jewish groups are expressing their solidarity with Israel by dispatching missions to the Jewish state. A group of leaders from mainstream Jewish organizations was scheduled to leave for Israel last Sunday while a mission that brought together members of three synagogues was also set for the same day.

However, the Jerusalem Post reported last week that four of 20 Jewish community missions from the United States to Israel were cancelled and other groups were wavering as the deadline for a decision to travel approached.

Telem, the tour operator, said he has booked about 25 groups on trips to Israel scheduled to depart before the end of the year. A number of Jewish groups are travelling on bar or bat mitzvah tours while Christian groups are planning visits to the Holy Land for Christmas. Those groups have not cancelled.

Telem said that up to the recent outbreak of violence, Peerless had experienced a record year – 15 percent greater traffic than 1999 – and had expected to book even more visitors in 2001.

Fisher said El Al had been experiencing a very good year prior to the disturbances. Even with the October cancellations, "we have already exceeded our expectations for 2000," he said.

Prior to the outbreak of violence, prospects for October were so good, Fisher had persuaded head office to replace 200-passenger 767s with 427-seat 747s. Now it appears the larger planes will be flying from Toronto only three-quarters full, he said.

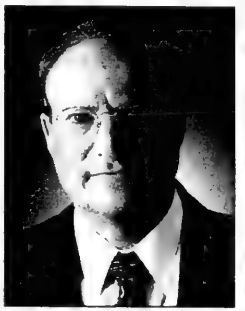
Palestinian violence said counterproductive

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Crisis in Israel

TORONTO – The Palestinians are using violence to extract still more concessions from Israel, but their tactic won't work, says an Israeli academic, commenting on the fighting that has convulsed the West Bank and the Gaza Strip since late September.

Yoram Peri – a professor of political sociology and communications at the Hebrew University – believes that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat seeks a peace agreement with Israel, but has decided he can get a better deal by means of pressure.



Yoram Peri

"His strategy won't succeed," said Peri, currently a visiting professor at the American University in Washington, D.C. and president of the New Israel Fund. "Israel won't yield to violence."

Suggesting that Arafat had erred in unleashing the current wave of unrest, Peri said he could have wrung more concessions out of Israel had he not broken off talks with Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

"Had negotiations continued, Barak might have given the Palestinians a greater presence in the Old City in Jerusalem and some form of control over the Temple Mount."

Arafat, he explained, is holding out for a greater chunk of the West Bank and east Jerusalem, for better terms on the right of return of Palestinian refugees, and for sovereignty over the Temple Mount.

In addition to these goals, he hopes to minimize the dominant role of the United States in Arab-Israeli peacemaking and to bring the United Nations and the European Union – which are less sympathetic to Israel – into the equation.

The low-intensity war the Palestinians have launched against Israel makes the attainment of peace in the near future all the harder.

But the peace process has not died, said Peri, author of Between Battles and Ballots: Israel Military in Politics.

Although Israel and the Palestinians no longer trust each other, he is optimistic that they will eventually resume discussions.

"Life is a dynamic thing, and things change." Beyond that, he observed, neither side can tolerate an indefinite round of violence. In the meantime, Peri warned, the situation may deteriorate yet more.

Barak, in his view, was right to call a "time out" to negotiations, since it is a formal expression of the existing facts on the ground.

However, Peri voiced skepticism about Barak's "unilateral separation" plan to disentangle Israelis from Palestinians.

"Technically, it can't work. It is more wishful thinking than a real option," as Israelis and Palestinians live in such close proximity, he said.

Turning to the recent violence among Israeli Arabs, Peri ascribed it to the discrimination they encounter in all walks of life.

Disagreeing with the notion that they constitute a fifth column, he said that they have generally shown loyalty to the state through several wars.

Israeli Arabs seek integration and equality, and the vast majority have no desire to become citizens of a Palestinian state, he noted.

Peri said that the New Israel Fund is now trying to rebuild bridges between Jews and Arabs.

Peri, whose latest book is titled The Assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, said that Rabin's murder five years ago this month underscored the streak of violence in Israeli society.

"At least 10 percent of Israel's population is willing to use violence against the Israeli government to further their aims."

He would not be surprised if a Jewish radical opposed to territorial compromise tries to assassinate Barak.

Peri said that democratic values in Israel have been undermined by Israel's occupation of the territories. "The longer the Arab-Israeli conflict is unresolved, the more damage it will cause to Israel's psyche."

Americans for Peace Now founder slams Arafat

Blames PLO leader for current upheaval in Middle East

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The founder and political director of Americans for Peace Now blames Yasser Arafat for the current upheaval in the Middle East.

Crisis in Israel

"Arafat created this crisis," said Mark Rosenblum in a talk last week at the Kolel building.

Blasting Arafat for having missed a golden opportunity to make a "historic compromise for peace" with Israel, Rosenblum said Ehud Barak had offered the Palestinians unprecedented concessions at last July's Camp David summit.

The two sides, he added, came "within a hair's breadth" of ending their 100-year conflict.

Arafat, Rosenblum observed, was unable to meet Barak halfway, and thus Israel is not responsible for the ensuing mayhem and chaos.

"Israel is hurting and is under siege," he said. "Israel feels as if the clock has been turned back."

Speculating as to why Arafat unleashed the current wave of violence, he listed three reasons.

- Arafat, having been blamed by President Bill Clinton for the collapse of the Camp David summit, sought to internationalize the Arab-Israeli dispute.
- Thinking that the politically besieged Barak was desperate for an accord, Arafat decided to squeeze yet more concessions out of him.
- Arafat feared that he was increasingly being seen by younger Palestinians as captive to Israeli demands.

Criticizing Likud leader Ariel Sharon for his provocative visit to the Temple Mount, Rosenblum said that Israeli police should have used non-lethal means rather than live ammunition and rubber bullets to suppress the subsequent Palestinian demonstrations.

Rosenblum predicted that Israel and the Palestinian Authority will eventually resume bilateral talks. But he warned the Palestinians that they will not achieve statehood by means of violence. "They can only get this state through negotiations with Israel."

He said that Israel cannot return to the negotiating table unless there is a renewal of security co-operation between Israel and the Palestinians.

Striking an emotional note, Rosenblum said, "I stand with Israel and the Jewish people at this moment."

In a reference to the deaths of 13 Israeli Arabs in recent rioting, Rosenblum said they seek "first-class citizenship and equality."

But for now, he lamented, a "brutal divide" separates Jews and Arabs in Israel.

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 10% Plus

In today's environment of low interest rates and volatile stock markets, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 6% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	12,000	26,300
Taxable Income	12,000	6,600
Tax (50%)	6,000	3,300
After Tax Income	6,000	23,000
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,000
Spendable Income	6,000	12,000
Gross Equivalent Yield	6%	12%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 100%

Jewish candidates on campaign trail for municipal offices

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There are Jewish candidates aplenty in the Nov. 13 municipal elections, beginning with incumbent mayoral hopeful Mel Lastman, who is going into the vote riding an unprecedented wave of popularity.

Toronto's Yiddish-spouting favourite son is seeking a second term as mayor, armed with an 84 percent approval rating and a $1 million war chest. Bolstering his seeming invincibility – apart from an infectious enthusiasm for the city and an uncanny ability to grab headlines – is a slate of 26 mostly anonymous candidates opposing him (making waves of late has been mayoral candidate Tooker Gomberg, a Jewish environmental activist).

Lastman, 67, is bucking the rumours of three years ago that he would serve just one term as the first mega-mayor. With amalgamation now a dim memory, he has set his sights on several grand plans and prickly issues: securing the 2008 Olympic Games, the massive waterfront development project, the on-going battle over Toronto's garbage, more affordable housing – all while grappling with a $1.2 billion debt and rumours of a property tax increase.

There are no burning Jewish issues on the municipal scene, save possibly for subsidized housing.

Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) is constantly getting calls for help with affordable housing, says executive director Gordon Wolfe.

"Waiting lists are getting longer, rents are going up and apartments are hard to find," Wolfe says. "It's an issue for the Jewish community."

He said Toronto has done very little in this area for the past few years.

Earlier this year, the provincial government established a new ward structure for the City of Toronto, slicing the number of councillors from 57 to 44. The new, larger wards are based on the 22 federal and provincial ridings in the city.

Because of the rejigging of boundaries, some races will see two incumbents pitted against each other.

In one of those, Milton Berger, who has represented Ward 9 since 1997 and was a North York council fixture for years, is facing off against Ward 22 councillor Anne Johnston in the new Ward 16 (Eglinton-Lawrence).

Mike Feldman, also a former North York councillor and Ward 8 representative for the past three years, as well as a well-known figure in Jewish circles, is seeking re-election in Ward 10 (York Centre).

Howard Moscoe, who has also represented Ward 8 on city council, is running in Ward 15 (also called Eglinton-Lawrence), where he's facing three opponents.

Norm Gardner, long a visible presence on the Jewish and municipal scenes, will not seek re-election. Gardner, who has occupied the Ward 10 seat since 1997 and has served as chair of the police services board, is rumoured to be weighing an offer to represent the province on the board.

Rosie Schwartz is making an effort to unseat incumbent Olivia Chow in Ward 20 (Trinity-Spadina), while newcomer Youval Zilberberg is running against incumbent John Filion and one-time North York political figure Ron Summers in the new Ward 23 (Willowdale). David Shiner is seeking re-election in Ward 24 (also called Willowdale).

In a letter to area residents, Rabbi Gunther Plaut recently endorsed Joe Mihevc in the new Ward 21. Mihevc, a theologian with a background in Holocaust education, is an incumbent who is running against another incumbent, Rob Davis. Both represented the old Ward 28.

In races for trustee on the Toronto District School Board, Sheine Mankovsky is seeking re-election in Ward 5 (York Centre); Shelly Laskin is running again in Ward 11 (St. Paul's); while incumbent Gerri Gershon is running in Ward 13 (Don Valley West).

In York Region, a spirited race is taking place in Vaughan's Ward 5, where former councillor Bernie Green, who held the seat for nine years, is attempting a comeback against Susan Kadis, who defeated Green in 1997. The ward is home to dozens of Jewish schools, synagogues and institutions, and has the highest concentration of Jewish voters in the region.

Next door in Ward 4, Coun. Mario Racco has been acclaimed.

One race to watch for a seat on the York Region public school board is in Vaughan's Area 2, where Alan Shefman, a community activist and former director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, is vying to fill the vacancy left by the departing Harvey Nightingale. Shefman is running against Simon Strelchnik, a student.

'By our moral and spiritual strength'

The fifth anniversary of the killing of Yitzhak Rabin falls on Nov. 4. As a people, we have still not recovered fully from that nightmarish trauma. Many of the questions we asked of ourselves then remain unanswered.

"Rabin was a Jerusalemite, born on March 1, 1922. Like many of his generation, he was born into a turbulent Jewish Palestine in the first half of this fateful century; his childhood passed quickly into adulthood. By the age of 19, he was fighting in the Haganah and by 25, he was the deputy commander of the Palmach. He fought in too many wars; led thousands of men into battle, buried many friends and the children of friends, and wept countless times at their graveside. His entire adult life was spent in service to his people. To us and to the Land of Israel he gave of his soul, deeply and totally. How bitter the irony that it was one of us, his own people, who took away his life…

"There is no doubt Rabin was reluctant to touch, let alone, shake the hand that was extended towards him two years ago on the front lawn of the White House in Washington. But just as experienced generals know instinctively when the pre-battle tension must be broken with the command to start engines, or when the battle must be joined despite the bone-wearying fatigue of their soldiers…Rabin knew instinctively, deep in his heart, he had to respond, to seize the initiative, to grasp the hand reaching toward him…He knew the battle had changed. His people, so courageous in war, must now test their courage in peace.

"Two weeks after the Six Day War, in a speech on Mount Scopus accepting the nation's gratitude to the IDF, Chief of Staff Rabin spoke of the spiritual and moral dimension of the IDF and of the nation from which it sprang. He described the Jewish people as 'a people which rises above itself in times of crisis and prevails over all enemies in the hour of trial by its moral and spiritual strength.'"

Still struggling to truly understand what we lost on that horrible Saturday night, five years ago, we are now faced with the new trauma that the peace process may be a delusion. In bitter fact, there may be no Palestinian leader wishing or able to make peace with the Jewish state.

There is no denying, alas, we are now in a time of crisis and in an hour of trial. A peaceful resolution of the conflict with the Palestinians seems hardly possible under current conditions. We must therefore find inspiration in Rabin's words. We are "a people which rises above itself in times of crisis and prevails over all enemies in the hour of trial by its moral and spiritual strength."

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Untenable political contradiction

Most Canadian Jews were angered by Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy's support for a UN Security Council resolution condemning Israel's use of force in the current conflict with the Palestinians. But we Canadian Jews are now seeing the ideological chickens coming home to roost. We can't have it both ways. We cannot provide uncritical support to those who propound the ideology of secular "human rights" multiculturalism while demanding of these same people that they then turn around and, to please us, support ethno-religious nationalism (that is, Zionism) in an ethnically-based state such as Israel. This is an untenable political contradiction.

Why should they make an exception for us Jews, in a way they don't and won't for other ethnic nationalists such as Sikhs, Tamils in Sri Lanka, Serbs and/or Albanians in the Balkans, ethnic Fijians, and so many others?

Let's face it: There is no way that today's liberal western political elites, wedded as they are to opposing nationalism, would have allowed a partition of Palestine and creation of a Jewish state in 1948. We would have ended up with a Bosnia or Cyprus-style Palestine, a fake state whose international face would have been Arab – since Palestinian Arabs were a majority – but containing de facto rival ethnic statelets that would have have had no standing in international law. What a mess that would have been! For all of its problems, at least Israel is a sovereign state.

Urges appropriate 'votes'

Not only should we, as a community, be answering the Liberal party's poor judgment in supporting the awful UN resolution by our vote in the upcoming election, but we should also, as a community, react to the one-sided portrayal of Israel in the print media such as the Toronto Star.

I cancelled my subscription to the Toronto Star 11 years ago. I have picked up the occasional copy recently and note that its anti-Israel bias continues.

As we demonstrate with the Liberal party, I encourage our community to similarly behave with the media and "vote" with our pocketbooks to cancel our subscriptions and cease advertising in newspapers that show very little compassion for our community.

Pipeline an election trick

In my opinion Jean Chrétien's pipeline to the Jewish community (CJN, Oct. 26) is nothing but an election trick that tries to bring antagonized and frustrated Jewish voters back to the Liberal party.

The damage in the UN was already done and cannot be taken back. Too late did Chrétien and his political friends realize the political damage done to them on the home front.

The $200 tax rebate

We applaud the action of Rabbi Michael Dolgin (CJN, Oct. 19), urging taxpayers to donate their $200 cheque from the provincial government to charity.

Jewish Family & Child Service serves children living in poverty, abused women and the homeless. We find it reprehensible that the provincial government sent out this money while the gap between rich and poor continues to widen and funding for essential social services is reduced.

A recent national survey by the Canadian Association of Food Banks found that almost 40 percent of food recipients – 256,400 – were under the age of 18, an 85 percent increase over 1989 survey figures.

We encourage members of our community to donate their $200 tax rebate to any social service agency that works to eradicate child poverty.

Perspectives

'Enough of blood and tears'

Five years ago on the terrible Saturday evening of Nov. 4, Yitzhak Rabin was murdered in Tel Aviv, shot in the back by Yigal Amir, moments after the prime minister had spoken of his hope for peace.

Rabin as chief of staff.

It is imperative that we remember the yahrzeit of the assassinated prime minister (Cheshvan 12) to prevent, if possible, the occurrence of a Jew ever again raising his hand in hatred and blood against a fellow Jew.

It is imperative as well that we remember the assassinated prime minister's dream of peace that he had articulated so movingly and for which he was ultimately murdered by one of his own people.

How poignant and painfully ironic is the sense of loss both for the man and for his vision in the wake of current events in the Middle East.

The assassin took Rabin's life; the Palestinians are now murdering his dream.

The following is an address made by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin on the occasion of the signing of the Israeli-Palestinian Declaration of Principles, Washington, D.C., Sept. 13, 1993.

President Clinton, Your Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen:

This signing of the Israeli-Palestinian Declaration of Principles, here today, is not so easy – neither for myself, as a soldier in Israel's wars, – nor for the people of Israel, – and not for the Jewish people in the Diaspora, who are watching us now with great hope, mixed with apprehension.

It is certainly not easy for the families of the victims of violence, terror and war, whose pain will never heal. For the many thousands who defended our lives with their own, and have even sacrificed their lives for our own – for them, this ceremony has come too late.

Today, on the eve of an opportunity for peace – and perhaps an end to violence and wars - we remember each and every one of them with everlasting love.

We have come from Jerusalem, the ancient and eternal capital of the Jewish people. We have come from an anguished and grieving land. We have come from a people, a home, a family, that has not known a single year – not a single month – in which mothers have not wept for their sons.

The memorable handshake on the White House lawn.

A spontaneous memorial on the spot where he was murdered.

We have come to try and put an end to the hostilities, so that our children and our children's children will no longer have to experience the painful cost of war, violence, and terror.

We have come to secure their lives, and to ease the sorrow and the painful memories of the past – to hope and pray for peace.

Let me say to you, the Palestinians: We are destined to live together, on the same soil in the same land. We, the soldiers who have returned from battle stained with blood, we who have seen our relatives and friends killed before our eyes, we who have attended their funerals and cannot look into the eyes of their parents, we who have come from a land where parents bury their children, we who have fought against you, the Palestinians – we say to you today in a loud and clear voice: Enough of blood and tears. Enough.

We have no desire for revenge. We harbour no hatred towards you. We, like you, are people who want to build a home, to plant a tree, to love, live side by side with you – in dignity, in empathy, as human beings, as free men. We are today giving peace a chance and again saying to you: Let us pray that a day will come when we will say, enough, farewell to arms.

We wish to turn over a new chapter in the sad book of our lives together – a chapter of mutual recognition, of good neighbourliness, of mutual respect, of understanding. We hope to embark on a new era in the history of the Middle East.

Today, here in Washington, at the White House, we will begin a new reckoning in relations between peoples, between parents tired of war, between children who will not know war.

President of the United States, ladies and gentlemen, Our inner strength, our higher moral values, have been derived for thousands of years from the Book of Books, in one of which, Ecclesiastes, we read:

To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under heaven.
A time to be born, and a time to die;
A time to kill, and a time to heal;
A time to weep, and a time to laugh;
A time to love, and a time to hate;
A time for war, and a time for peace.

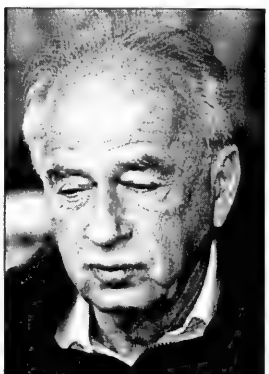
Ladies and gentlemen, the time for peace has come.

In two days, the Jewish people will celebrate the beginning of a new year. I believe, I hope, I pray that the New Year will bring a message of redemption for all peoples: a good year for you, for all of you. A good year for Israelis and Palestinians. A good year for all the peoples of the Middle East; for you, our American friends, who so want peace and are helping to achieve it; for presidents and members of previous administrations, especially for you, President Clinton, and your staff; for all citizens of the world: may peace come to all your homes.

In the Jewish tradition, it is customary to conclude our prayers with the word Amen. With your permission, men of peace, I shall conclude with words taken from the prayer recited by Jews daily, and I ask the entire audience to join me in saying Amen.

"May He who makes peace in His high heavens grant peace to us and to all Israel. Amen."

Rabin's final words, moments before he was shot.



In a reflective mood.

The Lieberman factor

This column is being written just over two weeks prior to the American elections. As the crucial American date comes closer, I am still being asked just what the Lieberman factor might be. Is it good for Gore and/or is it good for the Jews?

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

As for Gore, the choice of Joe Lieberman has been beneficial in at least one respect: It has immunized him against the fallout from President Bill Clinton's peccadillos because the senator, though a Democrat, publicly chastised the president. Lieberman's Jewishness will undoubtedly attract many votes from his co-religionists that otherwise might have gone to the Republicans.

Of course, there is an anti-Semitic factor as well. There will be a portion of the population to whom a potential Jewish president is simply unacceptable. Between the anti-Semites on the one side and the Jews on the other, I see one cancelling the other.

A fair amount of criticism has surfaced about Lieberman's habit of involving God in his talks. Some say that this practice is contrary to American culture which draws a sharp line of separation between religion and state. But in many instances that line is clearly disregarded – the American coin proclaims the presence of the Almighty; chaplains of our major religions served in the armed forces, and Americans elected Jimmy Carter as president, a man who was (and remains) a Southern evangelical Christian.

All told, I do not believe that Lieberman's candidacy will make much of a difference when Americans cast their ballots. There is no question, however, that the Jewish community has gained additional confidence and felt its place in society affirmed by Gore's choice.

I am given to understand that many members of the Black community also feel affected by Lieberman's candidacy, in that it opens the door for all minorities to aspire to the country's highest office. But will Lieberman's candidacy lessen the gap between Black and White? I doubt it.

What appeals to me primarily is not only that Lieberman is a man of first-rate political credentials, but that he is a good Jew. He takes his religion seriously. Shabbat is a central experience for him and his wife, Hadassah. That very fact has made him attractive to many Christian fundamentalists, to whom their own Sabbath remains a vital experience.

Whatever the outcome, the senator's candidacy represents a new chapter for American Jews, and I would like to think that some of the effect will spill over into Canada as well.

Anti-Israel rhetoric flies at Dalhousie

The past few weeks have quite obviously been very stressful for many people in the Diaspora as well as in Israel. The Jewish communities across the world have been holding peaceful demonstrations to show their support for Israel and their displeasure with the violence that has been taking place on both sides. However, there is a feeling that this situation is more geopolitical than religious.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

In Halifax, we were honoured to have Vice-Consul Nina Ben-Ami of the Consulate General of Israel in Montreal to speak at our rally. In addition, we had a number of other guest speakers who represented different parts of the Halifax Jewish community. The evening was very informative, and most of us left feeling inspired by the various speakers and by the singing of Hatikvah at the end of the night.

What has been so upsetting to me lately, however, has been the hostility that I have felt on campus here at Dalhousie University. For more than a month, there have been several "anti-Israel" demonstrations held at the Student Union Building. The first few demonstrations consisted of a number of people protesting with signs outside and shouting. As one would imagine, their screams, as well as the content of their signs were quite horrible. Mentioning them in this article would simply lend credence to their fabrications.

After this had continued for a few weeks, things escalated. An anti-Israeli speaker spoke at Dalhousie University about "the real stuff" going on. In addition to spreading hatred and misconceptions, he was biased, and actively discouraged the Palestinians from engaging in any dialogue with the pro-Israel group on campus. Following that program, there was a Palestinian "exhibit" in the Student Union Building that spread similar propaganda and resentment, along with graphic pictures taken out of context.

The part that has alarmed me so much is that even though I know the truth, what about people who don't know what is going on in the Middle East? What are they going to think when they see all of this material on campus? The Jewish students are now trying to decide what route should be taken, but it has been agreed that we do not want to take the same path as the Palestinians. We feel outraged, but we also do not want to lower ourselves to handing out leaflets condemning them.

The reason we did not deal with this immediately was that we felt that in doing so, we would look defensive, rather than holding our stance of seeking anti-violence. We plan to do something that stresses anti-violence and peace rather than point fingers, as we acknowledge that no one on campus is going to benefit from further pugnacious behaviour.

We are all entitled to our feelings and different points of view; controversy is one of the best forms of edification. The Canadian Constitution guarantees us the right to speak our minds freely, and I am completely in agreement with this. However, freedom of speech can only extend so far, and when one person's speech turns to pure hatred, this is problematic. It is one thing to have a demonstration on campus against something that is obviously wrong. But it is another to spread damaging, hateful incitement to the public. What we have witnessed recently has been destructive and offensive. Especially in a university environment, where education is a number 1 priority, this type of behaviour alienates many people and is not conducive to a good learning environment.

When I left for university, I remember the feeling of excitement that I experienced as I hoped to become more independent, with more freedom and social diversity. This was what I had always thought university was all about. The idea of being around so many people with so many different points of view was something to look forward to, after growing up in a homogeneous environment.

What had never crossed my young and naïve mind was the possibility of such hostility on campus or the hatred and propaganda I am now experiencing. It is my hope that we can change this type of behaviour on campus for the sake of all people, and to allow freedom of speech to flourish without prejudice and malice.

Learning about the land

Oct. 23, the day this article was due, also marked the first day of classes for students. No, not for Canadians, but for students across the ocean, in a land now plagued by violence and conflict. On the fourth Monday in October, academic life begins at Hebrew University.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Hebrew U has always been a fascinating concept for me. Going to school while living life in Israel – how can it get any better than that? Many Winnipeggers have clued in to that fact as well. Every year, Winnipeg seems to send off a large number of students to the holy land, this year being no exception. Seven students from Winnipeg have taken the journey to Israel, ready to learn about the land and its history, and to meet some people along the way.

I have always wondered why Winnipeg students have shown such strong support by heading to Hebrew U. I think it stems from Winnipeg's strong commitment to Israel and Jewish culture. March of the Living always has a number of participants from this city, as do various Israel Experience trips that Winnipeg promotes. Students from Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate culminate their high school experience by venturing for six weeks to the land of milk and honey. For most people, all of these things lead to an enhanced appreciation for Israel. And what better way to show that appreciation than by living in your homeland for the year?

Shaun Bronstein, who went to Hebrew U last year, thinks that a big part of the Winnipeg students' desire to go to study in Israel, is fostered by the city's small community.

"I think that Winnipeg contributes the number of people it does because it's a tight community. When people go away for the year, everyone knows. When people come back, they spread the word. The experience is so amazing that they want to share the experience with others," he said.

I spoke to Brenda Gurvey, director of the Winnipeg chapter, of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, about why people go to Hebrew U. She said a lot of students go to experience the archeological richness of the land, or they go for the political science or religious aspects. I also agreed with her when she said that going to university in Israel is a "wonderful way to connect to your Jewish roots."

What about today, when there is so much turmoil in Israel? Are people worried about experiencing Israel now? The amazing thing about the land is that no, they are not really worried about spending the year Israel, even in the midst of violence. A lot of my friends are attending Hebrew U this year, and they say that although they were initially worried about the violence in Israel, they still feel safe in their new home.

I hear all about the amazing experiences that Hebrew U provides. From learning about Arab-Israel relations to talking to people around the world, this program is one of a kind and once in a lifetime. So, the big question I ask myself is why am I in Winnipeg when I could be in Israel?

Honestly, I have no idea. Maybe it has to do with the idea that I have to finish school as soon as possible and get a job and raise a family and all that stuff. Maybe I'm scared of a new, independent experience. Although I believe these thoughts to some extent, I don't think they would be determining factors in my not going to Israel. So I don't know what it is, why we don't all go to reap the benefits Israel provides.

Shaun Bronstein told me he feels that every Jewish student should go on this program. He said it was a life-changing adventure that could not be matched by anything else.

If I don't go, at least there are a lot of Winnipeggers who have clued in to the idea that Hebrew U is the place to be. I can take pride in the fact that the seven people who are in Israel now are going to come back and strengthen our community and share their experiences, and keep Winnipeg's strong record of sending students to the Jewish homeland.

The Kirshner File

Yugoslavian crisis galvanized law professor

The sudden fall from power of Yugoslavia's long-reigning strongman and indicted war criminal, Slobodan Milosevic, carried special weight for York University law professor Michael Mandel, who has a keen interest in Balkan affairs.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Last year, he and colleagues from England, Norway and Greece sent Carla Del Ponte, chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal of the former Yugoslavia – a United Nations agency – a hefty dossier laden with accusations.

In language brimming with indignation, they charged Western leaders, including Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and President Bill Clinton, with war crimes in connection with the 1999 aerial bombing of Serbia.

Accusing the North Atlantic Treaty Organization of having waged an unlawful war in which civilians were wantonly killed and property was wilfully destroyed, they requested a formal investigation into NATO's 78-day military campaign, purportedly launched to squelch Serbia's ethnic cleansing of Albanians in the rebellious Yugoslavian province of Kosovo.

Last June, Del Ponte rejected their jeremiad, but Mandel was hardly cowed or discouraged by this setback. "After the International Criminal Tribunal ruling, there is no place to go with the war crimes complaint," he conceded. "But I think we accomplished what we set out to do: to weaken the use of the tribunal to legitimize this illegal and expansionist war as something noble and legitimate.

"Since the evidence was powerful – NATO violated the Geneva Convention all over the place – we thought the tribunal would have to act or reveal itself as a fraud. We suspected that from the beginning, of course, because of the close relationship between Del Ponte's predecessor, Louise Arbour [now a Supreme Court of Canada judge], and the Americans."

Mandel, who describes Del Ponte's final report as "an amateur whitewash," draws solace from the fact that two internationally respected organizations, Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, issued scathing reports condemning NATO.

And, now, he is writing a book on last year's war from the viewpoint of international law and whipping up support to abolish the tribunal altogether. "Most of the world thinks it's a hoax," said Mandel, who bristles at the use of law as an instrument of force.

When NATO launched its massive air war in a bid to stop Milosevic from crushing the Albanians in Kosovo, Mandel was in Italy as a visiting professor at the University of Bologna. Outraged by the mounting casualties, and convinced that NATO was in violation of international law since it had not consulted the UN Security Council, Mandel got to work. Among his collaborators were associates from York University's Osgoode Hall Law School.

"I was opposed to the war because I didn't believe NATO was in it for humanitarian reasons. NATO is essentially the United States. Eighty percent of the missions were flown by American pilots. I believed the Americans were exploiting and terribly aggravating a tragedy of their own creation. I believed that the whole disaster in Yugoslavia was due to the aggressive and greedy policies of the rich Western nations, especially the United States.

"I believed that if they were really interested in preventing bloodshed, they had plenty of opportunities. I believed this was a classic war of expansion for the United States, trying to reinvent a post- Cold War role for NATO and to free itself from any restraints imposed by the UN and, indeed, to overthrow its authority."

Western leaders, he claimed, committed crimes against humanity, damaging cities, towns and villages and wreaking havoc on religious, charitable, educational, artistic and scientific institutions.

As a Jew, Mandel was particularly incensed by the comparisons drawn between the plight of the Albanians in Kosovo and the fate of European Jews during the Holocaust.

"The killing of innocent civilians by soldiers and paramilitaries was a tragedy," he said of Serbia's campaign against the Albanians. "But any attempt to make a parallel with the Holocaust is nothing less than an outrage, a form of revisionism. The civilian death toll in Kosovo was 3,000, not six million."

NATO, he said, abused the legacy of the Holocaust to further its objectives.

Mandel, a 1972 graduate of Osgoode Hall Law School who finished first in his class and a teacher at York University since 1978, has never been one to shut his eyes to political and social injustices.

Since the 1970s, he has fought against police abuses and worked for nuclear disarmament and peace in the Middle East.

Surprisingly enough, his activities have neither affected his career nor resulted in lost friendships. "My career hasn't been limited in any way at all important to me," he observed. "I can't remember losing a friendship, but I know I've gained lots of friends. Being involved in political struggle over shared ideals is, in my experience, a great basis for lasting friendships."

Now 52, he was born in Toronto, the son of Max and Hilda Mandel, who immigrated to Canada from Poland around 1927. Apart from Michael, they had two children, Marilyn and Sharon.

Michael Mandel

Hailing from Opatow, a town whose Jewish population was virtually wiped out during the Holocaust, Max Mandel was a singer and radio personality in Toronto who hosted various versions of The Jewish Hour from the 1930s to the 1950s. Hilda, from Bialystok, sold dresses from the basement of her house and from a store on Bathurst Street. "She was my inspiration to work against social injustice," he said.

Mandel is clearly a man of the left. "I think Karl Marx had some brilliant insights that help us understand the inherent destructiveness of our economic system. The work of the Marxists in exposing the role of law as a reflection and protector of economic power has been a powerful influence on my intellectual work."

He added: "Marx stands in the great critical Jewish tradition. I think our imposed marginality, combined with our urbanism, internationalism and literacy, is what has accounted for our prodigious production of radicals, from Marx to Sigmund Freud."

Mandel, who occasionally attends the Narayever shul, an egalitarian Conservative synagogue in downtown Toronto, was a visiting professor of comparative constitutional law at the Hebrew University in 1998. "It was a great experience. My wife, Karen Golden, and I want to spend more time in Israel. We will be there for a few months in 2001."

While living in Jerusalem, he participated in Peace Now demonstrations and protests and followed the workings of Israel's Supreme Court.

A supporter of the Oslo peace process, he thinks that the concessions made by Prime Minister Ehud Barak in Camp David last July are a good basis for a lasting agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. "The alternatives are unacceptable. More war, more hatred. More death, for Palestinians and Jews alike."

He disagrees with the judicial activism of Israel's Supreme Court. "I generally don't like it. Usually, it's very conservative. And it's a symptom of a democratic deficit in society. People shouldn't have a few judges decide their important questions on the pretext of interpreting meaningless texts.

"The Israeli court under Barak is a unique exception in that its decisions have been universally progressive. But I still think this kind of elitist decision-making is dangerous, precarious and a bad sign of a deterioration in Israeli political life."

Mandel, the author of a book on the Charter of Rights and Freedom, dissents from the conventional view that it enhances democracy in Canada. "Quite the contrary. One thinks of the Ernst Zundel verdict. Freedom of expression, according to our current chief justice who wrote it, includes the right to tell deliberate Nazi lies."

He agrees with a recent Canadian Bar Association report that racism is rife in Canada's legal profession. "Racism is the symptom, not the cause. Social inequality hits certain ethnic groups harder than others. It always will."

Mandel, the father of three children from a previous marriage, Max, Giulia and Lucy, once entertained ambitions of being an opera singer. He set that dream aside when he studied law, yet singing remains one of his passions. He has been a featured soloist with the Jewish Folk Choir and has appeared at Friends of Yiddish summer concerts. In Italy, he frequently presented Jewish music concerts for various Jewish communities.

For Mandel, singing is ultimately a refuge from the harsh realities of life. "As singers know, singing doesn't relax; it thrills."

The Jewish spark

By GILA ASHTOR

We are small, but we are many.
We are young, but we unite.
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light.

I want to start off on the right foot so I am going to be honest with you. I'm not good at science or biology or chemistry or physics.

In fact, for four years now, I have been approaching every teacher in the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's science department with the same question, hoping that perhaps science could answer what logic could not.

In the spirit of a 17-year-old member of Toronto's Jewish community, I have always wondered how a history that resonates with the world's cruelest persecutions, pogroms and exiles, has not extinguished the light of the Jews. And the reason I chose my high school science department is because if the Jewish people can be compared to light, then perhaps physics could explain our enigma.

Needless to say that science had no answers, only that I am part of this miracle, and that you who read this are the rest.

Everyone knows that the two elements that magnify a candle's beauty are the flame it produces and the light it exudes. What we already know is that without the flame there is no light. What I only recently discovered is the second condition for our success: that without the light to illuminate the world, there is no flame to flicker.

Our parents and grandparents are the flame of this Jewish equation. They are the builders, pioneers, makers of our lifestyle. Together they have struggled to build our schools, establish our synagogues, design our institutions. Carefully, these architects of our community have infused our lives with a strong sense of Jewish identity and pride, and have paved the way for our social, cultural, and religious freedom.

But two conditions are needed for energy to spread, and whether it is through being students at a Jewish day school, members of Jewish youth movements, counsellors at Jewish camps, or just teenagers who follow the modern achievements of Jews around the world, it is we who transmit the radiance of the candle they ignite and carry the torch of their past towards the future.

Yes, we have been spared the horrors of witnessing the Holocaust, but by spending "teenager time" on the March of the Living, we are trying our best to honour the past of our predecessors.

Yes, we have never petitioned for our places in universities, but joining Jewish organizations at York University, or volunteering for NCSY, UJA or the JNF, is saying, as loudly as we can, that all the founders, makers, creators and supporters of the Jewish community have given us so much for so long, and that now we are ready to give some back.

For the next while, I shall try my best to depict the way my peers, youth members of the Jewish community, affect the future of Jewry; and by establishing information networks throughout schools and organizations, I hope to compile my columns in ways that represent each issue with justice and flavour.

After all, what I learned the hard way is what you don't need physics to understand: that to the candle of Jewish continuity, you are all the flame, and we youth are the light.

Lipstadt 'grateful' to have tangled with Irving

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It had to happen sooner or later: A legitimate historian is sued by a Holocaust denier for impugning the latter's "good name."

Deborah Lipstadt says she's glad she was able to respond.

The Emory University professor of Jewish and Holocaust studies, told over 1,000 people at Adath Israel Congregation last Saturday night at the kick-off to Holocaust Education Week: "I stood up for victims and survivors and those who cannot stand up for themselves. Someone had to do it, and I'm profoundly grateful that I was the one."

Holocaust Education Week

In a case that made headlines around the world, Lipstadt, author of the 1994 work, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, was sued for libel by notorious British pseudo-historian David Irving, who alleged Lipstadt had damaged his reputation by referring to him in her book as among "the most dangerous" Holocaust deniers in the world.

Last April, a British court not only vindicated Lipstadt and established the Holocaust as fact, but was critical of Irving, saying he had persistently and deliberately misrepresented and manipulated historical truths, and is an active and pernicious Holocaust denier.

It may sound like a complete and satisfying victory, but it was hard-fought and difficult.

For 10 weeks, Lipstadt and her lawyers had to listen to Irving's "painful and horrible" rantings about how Adolf Hitler never knew about the Holocaust, how the gas chambers were erected for the amusement of tourists, how "only" a few thousand Jews perished at Auschwitz, and how Lipstadt was leading an international Jewish conspiracy out to get Irving.

In an informal, anecdotal talk, Lipstadt said it was difficult for her to keep quiet in the face of that vitriol.

She did not testify "because I didn't want to engage [Irving] in debate. By ignoring him, we wanted the judge to think this was all garbage."

Unlike libel in the United States, the onus in Britain is up to the defendant. Lipstadt had to prove her allegations were true.

So her lawyers shifted the emphasis to Irving.

"We decided to put Irving on trial, to focus the spotlight on his work. We dissected his work on the Holocaust, and proved it was false – what one expert called 'a tissue of lies.' We made him defend what he wrote."

One example of Irving's mind-set, Lipstadt noted, was that when he re-published his 1977 book Hitler's War, he omitted all mention of the Holocaust. When someone asked why, he reportedly responded, "When something didn't happen, you don't dignify it even with a footnote."

Neither did survivors testify. "We didn't feel it was ethical for a survivor to have to confront this man."

However, she said, the "most emotional" part of the trial was survivors' testimony, submitted as evidence, testimony that was gathered in the immediate post-war period.

She also decided to keep the trial out of the press as much as possible "because a person like David Irving lives and breathes publicity."

Irving was kicked out of Canada permanently in 1992 when he defied an immigration ruling that sought to keep him out of the country for some speaking engagements. He's also banned from Germany, Australia and other countries.

Lipstadt's trial cost about $3.5 million (US), with $2 million of that shouldered by her publisher. Irving was ordered to pay

Deborah Lipstadt

150,000 British pounds to the publisher, Penguin U.K., and Lipstadt has applied to the court to seek payment of her costs from him. If that's successful, many believe Irving would be bankrupted.

Lipstadt has been hailed a hero, but it's an epithet she discourages.

"I'm not a humble person," she said to chuckles, "but I don't see myself as a hero. A hero is someone who has a choice, and chooses to act heroically. This had to be fought."

נמר בא העירה-יורם פירוצקי

All about prayer

Books
Bernard Baskin

A Guide to Jewish Prayer*, by Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, Random House, $42.50

The author of this comprehensive guide compares the siddur to a garland of flowers because it intertwines all the strands of Judaism and encompasses the many fields of Jewish creativity. It contains, he points out, exalted poetry as well as matters of ritual procedure, prayers that deal with the most intimate details of individual needs and problems, supplications reflecting the sorrows and aspirations of the nation, and prayers that touch upon the entire cosmos.

A Guide to Jewish Prayer contains a wealth of information. In which direction, for example, should the synagogue face? Certainly, toward the east. However, states the author, "This eastward orientation was only a general direction, not adhered to everywhere, since it was not always possible to construct the building to face the precise direction."

Then this surprise: "In fact, however, to the extent that there is, in the Jewish world-view, one particular direction that has an element of sanctity to it, it is not the eastward direction but the westward. It was in this direction that the Tabernacle in the desert faced, as did the Temple."

To achieve "kavanah," or concentration in prayer, it is necessary to shut out all distractions. The Sages have always warned against conversation in the synagogue even if the subject is neither trivial nor prohibited.

By the same token, it is improper to bring small children to the synagogue if they have not yet learned how to behave properly. "However important it may be, educationally, for children to visit the synagogue and to feel a sense of identification with it, care must be taken that this be done in such a way as to inculcate a proper attitude of respect."

If one hates another person in the congregation, for whatever reason, he ought to pray in a different synagogue. The author writes that "the women's gallery is built as a separate section of the synagogue, in order to reduce any admixture of emotions and sensitivities of another kind in the duration of the prayer. Obviously, partitions, as such, cannot prevent a person from thinking about anything, but they can at least minimize those thoughts that are stimulated by sight."

The head covering as a mandatory custom for men is fairly recent. It seems that formerly, Jewish men did not cover their heads at all times. However, the custom of wearing a head covering has spread throughout the Jewish world and has been accepted as normative in our times. It has even become a kind of symbol for religious observance.

This work includes chapters on prayer – daily, Sabbath and holidays – the yearly cycle of synagogue Bible readings, the history and architecture of the synagogue, the role of the rabbi and cantor, and the place of music in the service. It also includes a glossary, a bibliography and biographical sketches of the rabbis who were instrumental in creating and ordering the prayers through the ages.

Everyone can learn from this detailed and authoritative study by a renowned scholar. But as an exponent of traditional Judaism, Rabbi Steinsaltz has nothing to say about prayer as practised by other approaches to Judaism, or about new and experimental forms of worship.

Rescuing orphans from Ukraine

Roots & Remembrance

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

In the summer of 1920, Elie Heifetz, a Jewish professor from Ukraine, came to North America with documented reports that war and pogroms had left an army of 137,000 homeless Jewish orphans in Ukraine. Heifetz found the doors firmly closed against this class of refugee in the United States – but not in Canada.

Mrs. Lillian Freiman of Ottawa, a tireless figure in welfare and charitable work, took up the cause of these destitute children. She, along with the newly formed Canadian Jewish Congress and others, sent a stirring message to all Canadian rabbis and presidents of congregations just before Rosh Hashanah, describing the children's plight and seeking would-be adoptive parents.

Encouraged by the strong response, the group forwarded a request to the federal Department of Immigration and Colonization for permission to bring in 1,000 orphans. The department responded with permission to admit 200. Thus began a heroic rescue mission that Arthur D. Hart, writing in his 1926 book The Jew in Canada, describes as "one of the romances of Canadian Jewish life."

Rousing meetings were held in Jewish communities from coast to coast, stirring messages read from every synagogue pulpit. An urgent national conference was convened on the issue at the Chateau Laurier Hotel in Ottawa in October 1920.

In November, Mrs. Freiman and Miss Ida Seigler visited Jewish communities from Halifax to Vancouver. Funds were raised in every quarter. Adoption offers poured in by the hundreds, of which 228 were approved. In February 1921, members of the newly chartered Jewish War Orphans Committee of Canada sailed for Europe.

Reaching Warsaw, the rescue team was not prepared for what they encountered. "The Jews in Ukrainia have been in Hell," one worker wrote. "Young girls come here with the most heartrending stories. I am made sad from morning until night."

In Rovno, they found "children of perhaps four or five with features of aged persons, eyes sunken, cheeks nothing but skin and bone, bodies almost mere skeletons." The committee's Dr. Leavitt examined more than 1,000 children and found only 46 who met the health standards that Canada set for immigrants.

As medics examined thousands of children, workers sought Jewish civic records, eager to collect family information in order to keep siblings together. Finding many records destroyed, they visited old residents who had known the parents of the orphans in towns in the Zwihil, Chudnow, Zhitomar and Felstin districts.

Meanwhile, officials and would-be parents in Canada were growing impatient. The committee received a cable requesting that they reduce the number of children to 150, and return with some of them soon. But there were hurdles and complications to overcome. Where could they be housed en route? And how could they travel across international lines without official documents?

Telegrams flew back and forth concerning itinerary, clothing, food and travel arrangements. The first party of 51 boys and girls was taken to Vienna, and then to Antwerp, where they waited for official documentation to arrive from Ottawa. Eventually, another 95 orphans joined them.

The group left Europe on a steamship specially equipped with a kosher kitchen, and reached Quebec City on Aug. 20, 1921. The next day, they were disbursed to welcoming homes across the country. Hart reports that 34 were united with relatives, that many did exceptionally well at school, and that all were "giving promise of becoming good citizens… in an environment which will enable them to live the true Jewish life."

How did these 146 children ultimately fare in Canada? They or their family members are invited to write to me with their stories, c/o Roots & Remembrance, at The CJN.

Jewish Life

Kosher vegetarian alternatives

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In my last column, we began our look at Jewish vegetarianism and the places where you can find information on the World Wide Web. From gefilte fish to kreplach to chicken soup, meat and fish have become central to the Jewish palate. So finding vegetarian replacements that maintain links with our tradition can be a bit of a challenge.

The single-best kosher vegetarian recipe site that I came across draws its suggestions from the Jewish cuisine newsgroup [http://www.cyberkitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=VEGETARIAN].

There are over 150 recipes here and there's an added bonus. The site starts with some biblical and talmudic sayings about vegetarianism, and even quotes Isaac Bashevis Singer who, when asked if he was a vegetarian for health reasons, answered: "Yes, for the chicken's health."

The Kosher Kitchen Vegetarian Cuisine Web site is also worth a visit [http://www.screamingmeemies.com/kosher/]. There's quite an eclectic assortment of recipes here.

Beit HaChatulim describes itself as a Jewish Vegetarian Homeschool [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/]. Not only will you find out their philosophy about homeschooling but you can pick up some tips on preparing Garlicky "Cream" of Celery Soup, Pumpkin Biscuits and Corn Bread... I particularly like the recipe titled "Not-Chicken Soup." You can find a large selection of Jewish vegetarian books along with some excerpts at [http://www.micahbooks.com/jewishvegbooks.html] and yet more Jewish recipes at [http://www. geocities.com/Heart land/Hills/1259/bhfood.htm].

One of the biggest challenges facing kosher vegetarians is Passover. As they point out at Beit HaChatulim, once you rule out meat, fish, beans, rice, corn, and peas and anything chametz, putting together a vegetarian meal is difficult, but not impossible [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/vegypass.htm]. The about.com site has some suggestions for meatless seders that can be enjoyed yearround such as Cauliflower Fritters and Broccoli Knishes [http://www.vegetarian.about.com/food/vegetarian/library/weekly/aa041000a.htm].

There are many more general vegetarian recipes out there on the Internet. Yahoo's index is found at [http://dir.yahoo.com/Society_and_Culture/Food_and_Drink/Cooking/Recipes/Vegetarian/].

There are a couple of Usenet newsgroups geared toward vegetarians [news:rec.food.veg] and [news:rec.food.veg.cooking]. Or you can join a general (not specifically kosher) e-mail list for vegetarian recipes [http://www.egroups.com/group/Veg-Recipes].

Jewish Vegan/ Vegetarian Singles can be found at [http://www.jewishvegan.com/singlejvveg.html]. You can even get a free e-mail account that ends with @jewishvegan.com.

You can still keep kosher and vegetarian even if you're on the road. The Kosher Restaurant Database [http://shamash.org/kosher/krestquery.html] has information about almost 300 restaurants around the world where you can enjoy a kosher vegetarian meal. The Jewish Vegetarians of North America maintain a Web site at [http://www.orbyss.com/jvna.html] as does jewishvegan.com [http://www.jewishvegan.com/restaurant.html].

To find out more info about Israeli vegetarian organizations and restaurants, go to the listings at the World Guide to Vegetarianism [http://www.veg.org/veg/Guide/Israel/all.html].

If you really want to be pampered and well fed, there's the Israeli vegetarian village of Moshav Amirim [http://www.tour-israel.co.il/ upGalil/upGalil002.html]. The moshav offers a bed and breakfast 15 minutes from the old city of Safed.

And if you are thinking of settling in Israel, military service no longer means an end to a vegetarian lifestyle. According to the Jerusalem Post, the Israel Defence Forces Nutrition Division has introduced vegetarian rations following years of complaints from hungry vegetarian soldiers in the field [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2000/09/12/News/News.12046.html]. "The battle ration revolution has produced two new options: a baked macaroni-vegetable dish or rotini with vegetables in sauce."

B'tayavon and es gezunterheit.

A unifying force?

By RABBI YECHIEL BEN AYON

It is said every bird has wings, a right wing and a left wing; the brains, however, are always in the centre. That centre (and indeed virtually the entire left) has now, in light of the violence of the Palestinian uprising, significantly shifted to the right.

Whether the government of Israel will now form into one of unity or not is not important. The people of Israel have already unified. This unanimity sees the peace process as no more than the wishful thinking that it had been. It realizes that the path towards coexistence needs a totally different approach.

Fully discounting two-thirds of the population, it was always the sentiment of the mainly Ashkenazi "elite, old guard" in Israel that the voice of the second Israel – Sephardim and Russians need not be taken too seriously. As these groups did not have a tradition of democracy, not being privy to the democratic process in their lands of origins, this logic concluded that they were less than ready to participate in the apparatus of decision making.

For better or worse, for 2,000 years Sephardim have lived in Arab Muslim lands. Even the most obstinate mind would concede that this experience could offer some insight into the mindset of this Arab Muslim world.

There exists in the Arab Muslim world an integral and venerable method of conflict resolution, best illustrated in the bazaar. A vendor sets out his wares, never divulging their final price. The buyer can only demonstrate casual curiosity; to show genuine interest is an immediate disadvantage. The vendor then proposes an exorbitant price; to this the buyer feigns insult and counters with an impossibly low price. It is the vendor's turn now to express his indignity and dismissively offer a lower price. The bantering now begins, back and forth. It is not in earnest, however, until one party ceases dealing. Either the vendor dismisses the buyer or the buyer walks away. They both need each other, and they both want to conclude a deal. The buyer desires the item as much as the vendor desires the profit.

It is now that the advanced methodology of bantering comes into play. Both need to dig in their heels and to show stubbornness. The one that concedes is in bad form; he is the weak one. If he is the vendor, an even lower price will be sought; if he is the buyer, he will have to pay more.

One should not be angry or dismayed by the actions of the Palestinians. Rather we should be thankful. Finally, at last! A wake-up call. What had been an ignored mantra of the left is now self-evident to all: Fairness and concession are not respected but rather seen as a mark of weakness and gullibility, one to be taken advantage of. Negotiations with the Palestinians are much like the bargaining banter between a bazaar vendor and a buyer, only in this instance it can prove deadly.

The right's embrace of welcome of the left into their ideological camp should not be one of triumphant " I told you so." As Jews, our unity is paramount. I pray for the day when the demarcation of right and left will blur. In fact, I pray for the day when the right (myself included) will also march to the left and conclude the peace and coexistence we both want and need, right and left, Israeli and Palestinian. Only I pray that there will not be in it any trace of weakening or gullibility.

Teaching children the business

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lee Hausner feels the "business of family" is as important as the "business of business."

The California psychologist, author and business consultant will be in town next week to discuss Preserving Jewish Values in an Affluent Society. She will speak at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on Nov. 8 for Connections, the main event run by UJA FEDERATION's Women's Campaign & Advocacy.

Hausner's parenting advice applies across the economic spectrum, although her area of specialization focuses on psychological issues involving wealth and wealth transfer, a hot topic with the proliferation of young, newly wealthy dot.com entrepreneurs and investors.

"Suddenly everybody's talking about affluenza [a feeling of entitlement]," says Hausner, who began her career working in an Oakland ghetto prior to a 19-year stint as senior psychologist for the Beverly Hills Unified School District.

On the Web site of Dodd/Hausner and Associates, her consulting group dealing with problems confronting wealthy families and/or those involved in a family business, Hausner advises, "It is never too late to unspoil your children."

As evidence, in a phone interview from New York, the frequent traveller – a married mother of two grown children and new grandmother of one – cited a client family that included five baby-boomer siblings whose grandfather had created the family wealth. The grandchildren, all married with children, didn't realize they were overspending $9 million a year. Although it took a lot of work, Hausner reports that they are now on budget – a concept once foreign to them. Their children, she added, will not be raised with the concept of "anything I want."

In fact, Hausner recommends that children as young as eight be given the opportunity to serve on a junior board in families that have family foundations. Those families can allocate $1,000, get the young cousins together and help them make decisions, she suggests.

"Do you know how empowering it is to say to an 8-year-old, 'We can help the world. You find an organization that really needs the money and write a report about it.'

"Do you know what a great learning experience that is?"

Successful parents, regardless of income levels, raise children to be emotionally secure and able to contribute to the world, Hausner believes.

To achieve that end, she advocates strategies that are perhaps more familiar in the business world: family meetings, identifying values, learning to communicate, successfully dealing with conflict, and building a strong family team.

Common mistakes parents make include not according their children the same courtesy they would to business associates and telling their children what to do, she said. The latter "destroys their ability to be competent."

In language that reflects her business bent, she refers to four types of "capital" that are important for affluent families to preserve: human, intellectual, financial and social. That requires an "action plan," she says.

Affluence does not signify a dollar amount, Hausner noted. She equates it with "any point you have disposable income about which you make choices – more than you need to feed, house and clothe your family."

Author discusses the history of looted art

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although paintings looted by the Nazis in France were scattered to the winds after Germany's defeat in World War II, none ended up in Canada, says an American journalist.

Hector Feliciano, author of The Lost Museum: The Nazi Conspiracy to Steal the World's Greatest Works of Art, said he knows of no such pieces that found their way here.

In introducing Feliciano, AGO director Matthew Teitelbaum disclosed that he has launched an investigation concerning the provenance of its own holdings.

"We don't anticipate difficulties with our collection," he said, adding that the AGO is an institution that values transparency.

Feliciano, in a slide lecture, described Germany's looting of French private collections, largely Jewish-owned, as "the most methodical and systematic" in history.

In Paris alone – the art centre of Europe – the Nazis grabbed 203 collections containing over 100,000 pieces.

The Germans did not consider it theft. "They really thought it belonged to them," he said.

And they did not destroy their extremely detailed inventory of stolen art, he noted. "The Nazis were so organized they had lists on everything."

The looting began as soon as Germany conquered and occupied France in June 1940.

Top Nazi leaders, notably Adolf Hitler and Hermann Goring, were ardent art collectors. Particularly interested in Germanic, Dutch and Flemish masters, they deplored modern art as "degenerate."

They targeted the exquisite collection of the Rothschilds and of consummate collectors like Paul Rosenberg.

Feliciano believes that his acclaimed book set into motion a chain of events that enabled families to reclaim looted paintings, some of which are still unaccounted for.

In his view, there has been a positive "sea change" in the attitude of private collectors and museums toward looted art.

Nevertheless, some museums in possession of such works are still "dragging their feet" in resolving ownership claims.

By his estimation, Russia has the largest collection of looted paintings and Judaica, upwards of 500,000, in the world. He doubts whether the Russian government will return it.

Feliciano suggested that unwitting buyers of Nazi-looted art face the prospect of losing their investment.

He also spoke to a Lion of Judah luncheon sponsored by the UJA FEDERATION's Women's Campaign & Advocacy.

Hebrew language focus of outreach

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — During the month of November, more than 1,000 classes teaching Jews to read Hebrew will be offered across the United States and Canada.

It is all part of READ HEBREW AMERICA/READ HEBREW CANADA, a program organized by the National Jewish Outreach Program in New York.

A media release says that more than 15,000 unaffiliated and marginally affiliated Jews are expected to participate. To encourage those for whom English is not their first language, in certain locations NJOP will offer materials in Russian and Spanish. The organization expects to offer a French version next year.

Rabbi Ephraim Buchwald, founder and director of NJOP, says that "the Hebrew language has held Jewish people together for thousands of years. With the Middle East crisis of great concern to Jews worldwide, [this program] will provide participants with the knowledge that they are helping to ensure the ongoing vitality of Jewish life on this continent."

Students who complete the course this year will be presented with a mezuzah designed by well-known Israeli artist Yaacov Agam. This is a way, the media release says, "to emphasize the relationship between Jewish literacy and Jewish pride," as it will "help participants acknowledge and heighten their Jewish identity each time they walk past their doorpost."

The program is being offered at many locations across Canada. In Toronto, participating organizations include Chabad Lubavitch, the Sephardic Kehila Centre, Or Hadash Congregation in Newmarket, Kehillat Shaarei Torah, the Jewish Russian Community Centre, Pride of Israel, Beth Tzedec, Holy Blossom and Anshei Minsk.

In Montreal, classes will be held at McGill University Hillel, Shaar Hashomayim, Beth Ora, and Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem.

Other locations are Shaaray Tefilah in Vancouver; Tiferes Israel in Moncton; Sgoolai Israel in Fredericton; The Atlantic Jewish Council in Halifax; Machzikei Hadas and Beth Shalom in Ottawa; Beth Israel in Kingston; Shaarei-Beth El in Oakville; and the Yeshiva of Hamilton and Chabad Lubavitch in Hamilton.

Anxious children need to learn to cope

This is the second part of an ongoing series on current issues facing kids in the classroom.

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — What if my mommy never comes back to pick me up? What if no one likes me? What if I flunk the test?

Everybody experiences anxiety at some point in their lives. But for some children, worry over the "what if" questions can be so extreme that they can't function on a day-to-day basis.

For these kids, the classroom can be a frightening place, says Trina Epstein, PhD, a psychologist at the Child Health Unit at the Toronto Western Hospital.

The Canadian Institute of Child Health has recently identified mental health as a general area of concern.

The Anxiety Disorders Association of America has reported that 13 percent of children between the ages of nine and 17 are affected by anxiety disorders.

"This statistic is probably true in Canada as well," Epstein said.

Sandra Mendlowitz, PhD, is a psychologist on the anxiety disorders team at the Hospital for Sick Children who also works at the community-based Markham Stouffville Hospital.

At a recent conference she attended, anxiety was labelled the number 1 disorder in North America.

"In fact, 60 percent of the current referrals at Markham Stouffville are anxiety related," she said. "The second most common referral is depression."

"There is a definite link between anxiety and depression. They tend to occur together," Mendlowitz said.

Anxiety disorders can be seen in a spectrum of children and can be detected in babies as early as 21 months, said Katharina Manassis, MD, who is a child psychiatrist and director of the Anxiety Disorders Team at the Hospital for Sick Children.

In her book, Keys to Parenting your Anxious Child, Manassis states that "childhood anxieties are not as transient or harmless as once believed."

There are many different types of anxieties, Manassis said in an interview.

Some children suffer from separation anxiety – they're afraid to leave their parents; some children are socially phobic – they're afraid to mingle with their peers.

When the problem isn't dealt with in its early stages and the children are forced to continue struggling with their anxieties, there is an increased risk of social impairment and the development of a poor sense of self-esteem, Manassis said.

However, anxious children can be helped to overcome their difficulties, and parents and teachers can be an important part of the solution, she said.

"It is important for parents and teachers to learn to identify the symptoms of those children who are affected and then be able to intervene in a positive way," Epstein said.

"Cognitive behavioural therapy (CBT) is an approach which takes into account four elements that affect all children with anxiety disorder – physical, emotional, cognitive and behavioural."

With CBT, the children are taught to see the connection between what they're feeling physically, their emotions, what they're thinking in their heads, and then how they behave, Epstein said.

"The hope is that the next time they are faced with whatever is scaring them, the CBT approach will help the kids face and reappraise their worried thoughts."

"CBT is much more effective when it is combined with parental involvement," Mendlowitz said.

"The parental involvement is important because we can teach parents exactly what we teach the child so that parents can help the child become an active coper."

However, the therapy must be applied gradually so that the child does not experience failures in the process, Epstein said.

Manassis, Epstein and Mendlowitz have also put together a Teacher Resource Guide for Understanding Anxiety in Children.

"Schools are where the kids are spending their whole day," Epstein said, "and if you don't involve teachers, you are missing a very important piece of the work that needs to be done."

Very often, these children are the silent sufferers in the classroom and are therefore ignored. They aren't typically the ones who are throwing the pencils. However, she said, some anxious children do act out and it is often misdiagnosed as attention deficit disorder.

"Right now," Epstein said, "teachers seem to know very little about identifying children with anxiety disorders. There are certain cues that teachers should be looking for. And if certain behaviours are continued over a sustained period of time, then the teacher should be bringing this to the attention of the parents.

"Unfortunately, very little about mental health is covered in teachers' colleges. If teachers knew more about the relationship in children between thoughts and feelings and behaviours, I believe that it could take us far.

"You could do a little piece of prevention right there in the classroom."

Today, it has become much more important for teachers and parents to understand and identify anxiety disorders, Mendlowitz said.

Kids are living in an increasingly more complicated society and the pressures can be more intense. Computers are isolating kids, and isolation builds anxiety.

Furthermore, in years past, kids who suffered with anxiety disorders were mislabelled and were forced to drop out of school. Now we can help them cope, she said.

As to whether anxiety disorders are more common in the Jewish community, Epstein noted that many of her clients are in fact from Jewish families.

"So it begs the age old question – Are there more anxiety disorders in the Jewish community or are Jewish families just more likely to seek treatment?

"It's hard to know if there's a relationship," she said.

However, she said, "you see a lot of anxiety disorder in children who are perfectionists and high achievers, where academics are very important. You also see a lot of those very same features in the Jewish community."

Avie Bennett Negev Dinner honouree

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Avie Bennett is proof that there is no failure except in no longer trying.

Bennett, this year's honoree at the Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner, is an officer of the Order of Canada and the Order of Ontario. He failed to complete his university education but serves as chancellor of York University and has received two honorary university degrees.

He joined his family's business, Principal Investments, in 1948. A pioneer in the development of shopping centres in Canada, the company became Canada's largest commercial landlord. Then, after decades of success, it went into receivership in 1963.

Bennett paid off more than $1 million in personal guarantees over 10 years, and then started a business career again, forming First Plaza Inc., where he serves as chair and president.

He was on the board of McClelland & Stewart Ltd. when the publishing firm developed financial difficulties. Bennett bought the failing company from Jack McClelland and it has become Canada's premier publisher of award-winning internationally acclaimed Canadian authors, including Margaret Atwood, Anne Michaels, Robertson Davies, Alice Munro and Michael Ondaatje.

In an interview in his University Avenue office, the quiet-spoken honouree was reticent about speaking of his successes.

A devoted family man, he guards his privacy about his family, his wife Beverley, his six grown children and ten grandchildren.

He accepted the honour, he said, because "I admire the work of JNF. They are non-political and provide long-term benefits to all residents of Israel. It brings enjoyment to all the people and visitors as well as improving the environment."

Bennett was raised in a home steeped in Zionism. His parents, community leaders Archie and Sophie Bennett, married in Montreal in 1920.

His father was a well known philosopher and journalist who also built a giant real estate corporation. He was a founder and a president of the central region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Avie Bennett

Bennet's mother became one of the builders and a president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, president of Canadian ORT and an active executive member in many other organizations.

The honouree attended the University of Toronto, where, he says, his interests were not in the classroom but in spending time in the library reading 20th-century novels and attending concerts and exhibitions. After leaving university, he joined Principal Investments, which amassed an empire of 35 shopping centres and land holdings.

As a patron of the arts through the Bennett Family Foundation, he has supported the National Ballet of Canada and other theatrical and music groups.

He is also a director of many community, business and academic institutions and endeavours, including the Doctor's Hospital Foundation, the Governing Council of the University of Toronto and United Way of Greater Toronto, and he is a canvasser for the United Jewish Appeal.

"When I met Avie Bennett some 20 years ago in his former life, when he was a very successful real estate executive and I was a real estate analyst, I was impressed when he changed direction," said Ira Gluskin, JNF campaign chair and a longtime business associate and friend of the honoree.

"Avie bought McClelland & Stewart. It was very important to our country, but it is difficult to make money in Canadian publishing. I believe that he did it in part for philanthropic purposes, which is not out of character for him," Gluskin said.

"The Negev Dinner has a long history – a tradition of honouring outstanding communal leaders and great Canadians. Avie is both categories"

The 2000 Negev Dinner will be held on Sunday, Nov. 26, at the Sheraton Centre Hotel. Bennett, 72, will be honoured "in recognition of his outstanding contribution to the cultural life of Canada and dedication to Israel."

The proceeds of the 47th Negev Dinner will be used to develop a tourist, recreational and visitors area on the historic Gilboa mountain range in the Lower Galilee area of Israel.

The campaign team includes dinner co-chairs, Dr. Lorna R. Marsden and Knowlton Nash, JNF Toronto president, Sandy Posluns, Tom Ungar, chair of the board, and 125 volunteers.

Held helps immigrants settle in Canada

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Barbara Held, office services co-ordinator at the national office of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services is often first in the line of fire.

"I get letters from people around the world asking about Canada, or looking for relatives. I answer what I can, or pass on the request to representatives in the community they are asking about.

Spotlight

Barbara Held

"I could be the first person they've ever had contact with in this country," says Held, who has been at JIAS for four years.

The national office which oversees smaller cities across the country, is separate from the Toronto and Montreal offices which look after immigrants in those cities.

"Immigrants arriving in smaller communities such as Calgary, Vancouver or Edmonton typically see a social worker at a Jewish family services agency; we can provide any help they need with settlement or programming. I am on the phone regularly with people in these communities."

Held, who came from England about 25 years ago, edits the JIAS newsletter and maintains the organization's Web site, which provides updated information on the community. She also administers two endowment funds which go towards scholarships for new immigrants.

"It's a stressful job, but I enjoy helping people; it is especially important to me to help Jewish people.

"In one case, someone applied for refugee status in a small Canadian community. The executive director of that community asked me if I had any articles that could help with his case.

"I sent them all the clippings I had about the country involved, and I was told that that helped win the case. The fact that I was involved in helping a refugee stay in the country made me very happy."

She has also helped someone from Belgium find relatives here – Held found a similar name in the phone book – and a non-Jewish German man who was looking for former neighbours.

"I gave him some hints on where to begin his search. I am into genealogy, so I am very interested in people finding their roots. This is a great job for that."

Holocaust Education Week declared

TORONTO — Just as Ontario became the first jurisdiction outside of Israel to formally proclaim Yom Hashoah as a date of remembrance, the York District Board of Education became, in 1999, the first school board in Canada to formally proclaim a Holocaust Education Week.

On Wednesday, Oct. 26, that commitment was renewed as Holocaust Education Week was declared for the period of Oct. 28 to Nov. 9.

In his remarks before a meeting of the school board, school trustee Howard Shore noted that the Shoah was "the systematic, bureaucratic annihilation of 6 million Jews, including 1.5 million children, by the Nazi regime and their collaborators as a central act of state during World War II." While recognizing the Holocaust as a unique historical event, Shore stressed that the lessons of the Holocaust have universal application and therefore are important for all students.

"We cannot afford to allow our students and young people to forego the lessons of the Holocaust – the importance of diversity and the need for greater compassion and tolerance of others... Only through remembrance, teaching and understanding of the Holocaust can public consciousness be elevated and anti-Semitism, racism and prejudice eliminated."

Following Mr. Shore's remarks, school Supt. Vicky Bismilla presented an overview of the board's strategies for integrating Holocaust and genocide studies into the current curriculum.

Len Rudner, community relations director for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and vice-chair of the school board's Race Relations Advisory Committee was pleased by the declaration.

"This solidifies the position of the York Region District School Board as a leader in the area of race relations. The declaration of Holocaust Education Week, coupled with the ongoing work of the curriculum development team, is a positive step for current and future generations of York Region students."

Examining Middle East media coverage

Paul Michaels, director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), believes the print media is driven by some of the same imperative that motivate the electronic media. "It's easier for the media to go out and show what's easily photographed." The print media follow the agenda set by the electronic media.

"I'm not saying the media was deliberately biased against Israel...We have to understand the daily structural imperative of reporting." Jarring images, he continued, "give a partial account and if you don't get a broader contextual story, you don't get the full truth."

Stephen Cohen, national scholar with the U.S.-based Israel Policy Forum, thinks the media is one-sided, but its bias is generally towards conflict and violence.

"The media love conflict and it does not like peace," said Cohen, a native of Montreal. "They love to see people hurting each other, hating each other. Conflict is hot, peace is cold. That means they cover things when they're getting worse, not the things that make it better. And they make it worse by focusing on the worst events and showing them over and over again."

Years from now, the most enduring images of the Camp David intifidah may well be two pictures of young Palestinians.

In the first, 12-year-old Mohammed Eldura lies dead in his father's lap, killed at the Netzirim junction in Gaza by an Israeli bullet. In the second, a Palestinian exultantly flashes his blood-soaked hands before a frenzied mob after taking part in the murder of two Israeli reservists in the Palestinian police station in Ramallah.

In the Eldura case,the video cameraman focused on the boy and his father. Israel later released an aerial view of the scene that showed Palestinian gunmen on either side of Eldura shooting at an Israeli position. Unlike the impression of deliberate murder created by the narrow shot, the wider shot would have shown Eldura caught in a crossfire during a gun battle.

Friedman said his media contacts explained to him the wider shot was "not dramatic, that you don't take your camera off the dramatic image, otherwise you might lose it."

The gruesome Ramallah incident, meanwhile, came within a hair's breadth of not making the news at all, or of being reduced to a two line summary at the bottom of a daily recap of events. The tapes of all Western journalists – all except for a single Italian crew – were confiscated by Palestinian authorities on the scene. Only luck and a quick escape allowed the video to be smuggled out and brought to a world-wide audience.

Media observers argue Palestinian intimidation of the media at Ramallah is typical. They point to the grovelling apology offered the Palestinian Authority by another Italian television crew. Signed by Ricardo Christiano, representative of the RTI network ("the official Italian station") in the Palestinian territories, the letter is addressed to "my dear friends in Palestine."

The letter assures the PA that RTI did not film the Ramallah incident and that "we always respect and will continue to respect the journalistic procedures with the PA for journalistic work in Palestine...[sic] We thank you for your trust and you can be sure that this is not our way of acting. We do not, will not, do such a thing."

The Israeli paper, Yediot Aharonot, reported that RTI published the letter after the PA criticized the Italians and threatened the lives of Italian crew members. The Israeli Government Press Office later revoked Christiano's press credentials and he was recalled to Italy by his news organization.

"When journalists from democratic countries begin to cave in to the demands of regimes that routinely suppress criticism and debate, they have sold out on their integrity and moral judgement and have completely lost any credibility or claim to impartiality," said Rochelle Wilner, national chair of B'nai Brith's institute for international affairs.

The Christiano case may just be the tip of the iceberg, as far as Tamar Sternthal of CAMERA, the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America, is concerned.

"This just shows the intimidation," she said. "Who knows what kind of arrangements have been made to get access to information and that if they don't meet the qualifications of the PA – showing them to be victims – they'll be cut off from information or worse, in the case of RDI, receive death threats. It makes all the media suspect."

The CIC's Michaels agrees that journalists working in the Palestinian-controlled territories have been intimidated. "It's been explained to me that there has been intimidation when a story does not reflect the way the Palestinians want it to be reflected."

Michaels is critical of the way television news has covered recent events. TV reporting is driven by the need for strong images and so television reporting will naturally focus on violent occurrences. "The broader story, the way Palestinians have manipulated public opinion [against Israel] when it was they who rejected Camp David" has not been adequately reported, he said.

Friedman believes that Western journalists have been trained to "speak truth to power, and so are critical of the powerful and give voice to those they see as less powerful. That results in a bias against Israel at this time."

The CBC's coverage, Friedman continued, favoured the Palestinian interpretation of events, at least "to start off with. It's not telling a lie, but it's not telling the whole truth."

Friedman suggested that CBC Middle East correspondent Neil Macdonald "subscribes to the idea of speaking truth to power. He tends to be more critical of whoever he perceives to be in authority."

In a Sept. 11 article that was posted on the CBC's Web site, but which has since been pulled, Macdonald provided a backgrounder to the post-Camp David situation. Macdonald appeared to favour the Palestinian positions on Jerusalem, refugees and Jewish settlements.

CBC spokesperson Ruth-Ellen Soles said "CBC TV feels our coverage has been accurate, balanced and objective.

"We know it is a very complicated story about a very complicated process. We have enhanced our coverage by adding [reporter] Paul Workman and an additional producer and crew. All of this is to make sure we are getting as many different perspectives as possible."

Another media outlet that has come under fire for its editorials and commentaries is the Toronto Star.

"The Star in particular is problematic," Friedman said. They are "clearly focused only on blaming Israel, and not to holding the Palestinians and Yasser Arafat responsible for the violence."

Carol Goar, The Star's editorial page editor, rejects suggestions the editorials are unbalanced.

"I would argue that our editorials are as even-handed as we can possibly make them," she said.

JVS employees on strike

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Employees of Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) began striking Monday morning following attempts at mediation last Thursday and Friday.

The strikers are picketing at three locations – JVS' main office at 74 Tycos Dr., the North York Civic Centre, and 1280 Finch Ave. W.

Only three employees, of the 71 CUPE Local 2137 members who voted last Friday afternoon, accepted JVS' offer of a one percent salary increase and three "float days" in lieu of up to 13 Jewish holidays off with pay. The 80 employees involved represent just over half of JVS's 150 workers' an [illegible] job counselling, educational and vocational services to Jewish and non-Jewish clients.

The employee counter-offer included a four percent salary increase retroactive to Apr. 1, 2000 and a four percent increase on Apr. 1, 2001, as well as no concessions on Jewish holidays.

The Jewish holiday issue is "not only a tradition and something we feel very passionate about, but for years was a compensation for low wages," said Tia De Agazio, CUPE Local 2137 president and an employment consultant with the JVS youth program.

They also wanted a wage grid that would provide defined steps that employees move up, and four weeks' vacation for administrative workers, bringing them in line with pro-

Children's Holocaust literature a focus for Calgary professor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

One doesn't usually associate children's books with academia, but Adrienne Kertzer's career belies this perception.

For more than two decades now, the University of Calgary English professor who once specialized in the Victorian novel has blazed a path in the emerging field of children's literature.

Holocaust Education Week

"My interest in it really began when I started teaching at U of C and the main senior course that I was hired to teach was children's literature," she explained. "So I quickly moved from Victorian literature to children's literature."

Having mastered the genre, Kertzer has segued into a sub-specialty, children's Holocaust literature, and is now writing a book titled My Mother's Voice: Children, Literature and the Holocaust.

Kertzer, whose mother endured the agony of Auschwitz, has been exploring the representation of the Holocaust in children's literature since she delved into it in an essay for the scholarly journal Canadian Children's Literature in 1996.

Kertzer, who has been teaching a new course on Holocaust literature since the autumn, came to children's literature surprisingly late, as an adult.

Academia

Born in Oshawa, Ontario, in 1949, and brought up on a farm in nearby Whitby, she was a compulsive reader, but never owned many books herself. "When I joined a public library at age 13, I went straight to the adult section of plays and fiction," recalled Kertzer, the eldest of three children who also goes by the first name of Ada.

Kertzer, the children's book review editor of Canadian Ethnic Studies, as well as the new chair of the Phoenix Committee of the Children's Literature Association, appreciates children's literature for a number of reasons.

"I am interested in how we distinguish it from adult literature and in how and why certain books move from being adult books to children's books. I am also interested in the relationship between children's and popular literature, and what children's books reveal about how we imagine childhood and child readers."

A graduate of the University of Toronto and Harvard, and the mother of two teenaged boys, Nicholas and Joshua, Kertzer believes that children's literature is no longer an esoteric subject at universities.

"The recent interest in cultural studies has made specializing in children's literature in an English department less marginal than it once was," said Kertzer, who recently attended an international symposium on children's literature at Cambridge University that attracted almost 400 delegates.

"The range of papers presented at the conference was amazing," she said.

As she has discovered, there is quite a body of children's Holocaust literature.

Edward T. Sullivan, in The Holocaust in Literature for Youth, claims that close to 500 such works, originally written in English or available in translation, have been published.

"What interests me in this material are the choices writers make in presenting such horrific history to the child reader, and how these books test the limits of what we imagine as children's books," said Kertzer.

"There is an essential contradiction between our understanding of the Holocaust and how we imagine children's literature and child readers. It's not just the murder of so many children. It's as though the idea of childhood is itself destroyed. Think of how many Holocaust memoirs are subtitled 'the loss of childhood.'"

The books, in her view, vary in quality.

"I don't see it as my role to say which of them are the best for children. But I am very interested in examining the arguments regarding excellence in such books, and tracing the complex patterns in these books that do exist."

Kertzer, however, is personally drawn to books that challenge a child reader. Citing Jane Yolen's Briar Rose, she said: "It sets up a fairy tale in which a woman survives Chelmno, and then includes an afterword which pointedly tells the reader that history is not a fairy tale."

Due to her parents' experiences, Kertzer is acutely aware that the Holocaust does not lend itself to that traditional form.

Her father, George Haas, managed a large farm in his native Czechoslovakia. "This enabled him to come to Canada in July 1939. But the story is more complicated," she said.

"He had wanted to be an engineer, but an accident had prevented him from taking the entrance exam. Given Canadian immigration policies of the 1930s, that accident that led to his studying farming instead of engineering probably saved his life."

Her mother, Olga, was not as fortunate. In 1938, after Germany's annexation of the Sudetenland, the Slovakian town where she lived became part of Hungary.

In June 1944, three months after Germany marched into Hungary, Olga and her family were dispatched to Auschwitz, where Olga's father was gassed.

In 1947, Olga settled in Canada, where she met George, an operations manager for an oil company until his retirement.

"As a child, I did not think of myself as the child of a survivor," said Kertzer, whose husband Jon teaches modern and Canadian literature at the University of Calgary.

"We may appear to be obsessed with survivors today, but I can't recall having heard the word when I was a child. And my mother, despite her experience, remained in many ways a believer in European high culture."

Rusch a collector of ephemera

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Barbara Rusch, a Toronto-area property manager who is chair of the city's annual Holocaust education week, has amassed what is perhaps the largest collection of 19th-century ephemera of its kind in Canada.

Ephemera, she explains, is "the transient documents of everyday life, printed or handwritten, intended for specific use and disposal." Items include newspapers, magazines, advertising, greeting cards, tickets, coupons, brochures, letters, diaries – indeed, any kind of paper artifact not bound in a book.

Her collection includes many Judaica items, some from the Holocaust era, some from the Victorian era. She owns hundreds of late-19th-century and early 20th-century Jewish greeting cards. Attractive and colourful, many bear quaint domestic scenes of Jewish life. Some also feature intricate cut-aways and three-dimensional pull-outs.

Beginning as early as 1840, and increasingly after 1880, Jewish families exchanged New Year's cards at Rosh Hashanah. Many featured colourful representations of the blowing of the ram's horn or shofar, and the eating of apples and honey, symbolic of a sweet year ahead.

The Holocaust material includes round metal klei-dergelt tokens, inscribed with a Star of David. The tokens were given to incoming prisoners at Nazi death camps as pretend baggage claim-checks for personal property.

Rusch also has several samples of printed currency from Theresienstadt. Devised by the Nazis for use in the concentration camp, this strange "Jewish money" featured the image of Moses with long beard, hook nose and curly hair, holding up the tablets of the Ten Commandments.

The notes were printed ostensibly so that internees could barter for food and sundries at the ghetto stores, but the deception soon became evident. "All food was strictly rationed and nothing could in effect be bought with the false currency," Rusch says.

Rusch is named after a great-grandmother who died in the Holocaust. "I feel it's my duty to perpetuate her memory, which is why I devote so much time to Holocaust education," she says.

Her Judaica collection also includes a brochure printed to commemorate Queen Victoria's diamond jubilee in 1897, containing a sermon given by Hermann Adler, Chief Rabbi of the British Empire.

Various items from the collection have been exhibited in synagogues, libraries, galleries and museums around Toronto and southern Ontario.

President of the Ephemera Society of Canada since 1987, Rusch has focused much attention on Queen Victoria, the long-reigning British monarch who held the throne from 1837 to 1901, and became a symbol of her time.

"I have a special attraction to her. I recognize her weaknesses, but there was no question that she was an icon. She was looked to as a role model, both in terms of domesticity and in terms of her role in leading a nation. Although she would have vehemently denied it, she really was a feminist, balancing a household full of children with domestic responsibilities, and a very demanding public life."

Rusch, who has given lectures about Queen Victoria, has acquired various of the Queen's personal things, such as a pair of stockings, a bracelet and locket, original letters and greeting cards, even a few strands of her hair.

Nineteenth-century advertising, and so-called trade cards, are perhaps the largest component of Rusch's collection. These very beautiful and colourful lithographs, ranging from postcard to poster in size, were often distributed free of charge as commercial promotions.

It is largely on account of the various old diaries, manuscripts and personal letters in her possession that Rusch calls herself "the custodian of lost memories." She once read some passages from an American soldier's Civil War diary on a CBC-radio program, only to be contacted a few days later by a great-grandson of the soldier living in Calgary.

"I don't believe in coincidences," she says. "What are the odds of that happening? Somehow, ephemera forms magical links between the past and the present, and helps us connect with our predecessors so we can preserve their tales."

She also belongs to the Sherlock Holmes Society of Canada and the Friends of the Arthur Conan Doyle Collection at the Toronto Reference Library.

The Victorian age was far from an idyllic period, she says, noting that its social problems included slavery, child abuse, domestic violence and child labour. Colonialism, too, must be on that list, she says.

"In many ways the Victorian Empire was the 'evil empire' of the 19th century, and Queen Victoria was to some extent Darth Vadar."

Here she stops short and, realizing what she has said, breaks into a laugh.

"Did I say that?" she exclaims, with a grin. "I never said that before in my life! I hope she forgives me for that one!"

Anti-Israel letter concerns students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Samantha – not her real name – feels distinctly uncomfortable in sociology class these days.

The University of Western Ontario (UWO) student said that a letter to the editor of the four-day-a-week campus paper, the Gazette, from her sociology professor, Michael Carroll, has "definitely affected the atmosphere" in class.

Although he has not raised the subject of Israel in class, in the Gazette's Oct. 17 issue Carroll attacked the premise underlying the peace prayer vigil held by the Jewish Students' Union on the London, Ont. campus, and used words like "oppressor," "ethnic cleansing" and "apartheid" to refer to Israel and its actions vis-à-vis the Palestinians.

This is not the first time he has criticized Israel publicly. In a letter to the Gazette of Sept. 16, 1999, he referred to "atrocities against civilians…perpetrated" by Israel. The letter did not deal with the Middle East per se.

Samantha, who has one Israeli parent, is one of at least half a dozen Jewish students in Carroll's Introduction to Sociology class. She estimates there are between 150 and 200 students altogether.

Samantha has not confronted Carroll, nor has she composed her own letter to the paper, as some other Jewish students did. "I don't want to jeopardize my marks," she said.

She and a friend met with Kevin McQuillan, chair of the department of sociology, who, she said, told them that faculty members' opinions do not necessarily reflect those of the department or university. McQuillan was not available for comment when The CJN called last week.

Crisis in Israel

Samantha takes particular exception to "someone in [Carroll's] position" writing the type of letter he did. "Obviously it's going to make people in his class feel uncomfortable."

Carroll "doesn't know what the facts are," she said.

UWO student Mark Driman agrees that Carroll's understanding of the situation in the Middle East is "flawed."

In a response to the Gazette, Driman wrote that he finds it "threatening and dangerous" when professors share "biased, unfounded opinions with the community at large… What started out as a personal attack directed at the Jewish Students' Union (JSU), soon turned to what I perceived to be an anti-Zionist and blatantly anti-Semitic response."

The words "what I perceived to be" were added by the Gazette, Driman said.

Student Bander Abou Taka defended Carroll's criticism, which he maintained was "strictly targeting the discriminatory and indeed, aparthied-like [sic] policies of Israel."

In a subsequent letter, social science student Rob Bloom used irony to skewer Carroll's argument:

"I mean, sure, the Palestinians would be injuring and in some cases even killing the Israeli soldiers, but that's OK, because the Israelis are stronger, so they don't have the right to defend themselves."

Hussam Tabbara, an engineering student who wrote of "hurtful" labelling of Arab protesters as anti-Semitic, called on "everyone who reads this to get involved and find out what is really happening."

JSU director Arye Berk also feels education is key. He believes some Jewish students are uncomfortable because they lack answers and don't understand the details of the history of the peace process.

The JSU is working on a joint program with Arab students, he said.

When activists miscalculate

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Only political neophytes or the supremely arrogant would be excited to see their pet issues prominently featured in an election campaign.

Although admittedly heady stuff, having one's cause bandied about on the front pages of some of the country's most influential newspapers transforms that cause into a political football – the most dreaded status of all. And for the Jewish community, that is a status to be assiduously avoided.

No issue has ever appeared on the political radar screen that claims the attention of only one interested party. None! And few issues attract more stakeholders than Canada's Middle East policy.

Activist Canadian Jews will argue that: (a) they have a right to be upset with the government's position concerning the recent wave of Middle East violence; and (b) bringing pressure to bear on the government during an election campaign to adjust its policies makes for shrewd and effective politics. Unfortunately, this thinking is a miscalculation.

In the first place, statements from various Jewish organizations released after the meeting with the prime minister characterized the meeting as positive. (See last week's column). At this point therefore, the sting of the legitimate anger should have been partly removed by the community's leadership. Certainly, that would have been the expectation of the government. Such is the way of politics. In return for whatever consideration Jean Chrétien may have offered to the group he met with, the group, in turn, would inform their constituency that the "war" was over.

In the second place, once a demand on the political sector is conveyed through the media, every actor with a perceived interest in the issue reacts to that demand. In this case, consider the effect that the call on the government to demonstrate its support for Israel has triggered within the Canadian Arab community?

This kind of posturing is so counter-productive as to render its perpetrators guilty of "reckless indifference" or of harbouring some private agenda. The potential ramifications for Jewish relations with politicians of all political stripes are huge.

Perhaps it is not only the government that should be held accountable for its actions. Like charity, accountability begins at home. It may be that the grassroots Jewish community is overdue for an accounting from its own democratically elected leadership.

UN vote may hurt Liberals

vote will cost the Liberals when Jews cast their ballots. "We have explained our position on that," he said.

As far as Ronen is concerned, Jewish voters should be looking for a public statement from Chrétien that will reverse feelings that Canada has abandoned Israel.

"He can make a statement that Canada will closely monitor future UN votes," Ronen said, "and he can call on [Palestinian leader Yasser] Arafat to halt the street violence."

"Our community is reacting to domestic feelings of betrayal," said Ronen "and Liberals should not take any votes for granted."

Indeed, Jewish voters can put a dent in Liberal support on at least two counts: the UN debacle, and the Canadian Alliance's support of tax breaks for parents with children in Jewish schools, a position many Jews, especially in Ontario, have found attractive enough to join the Alliance and fund-raise for the party.

Last weekend, Canadian Jewish Congress was scheduled to release its position paper on the election, identifying the issues. Canada's UN vote, and its Mideast policy, is expected to be a high priority.

Other issues to be presented to candidates will be the pursuit of Nazi war criminals in Canada, a freestanding Holocaust museum in Ottawa, and the funding of Jewish day schools. The latter applies mainly to Ontario, which was found by the UN a year ago to be discriminating against non-Catholics for funding Catholic schools but not other faith-based schools. Ontario has more or less ignored the ruling, and Ottawa has passed the buck by saying education is a provincial matter.

CJC has also identified other so-called "tikkun olam" issues, such as child poverty and elder care. In the coming weeks, Congress regions will be holding meetings with candidates.

Also in the coming weeks, The CJN will be profiling the following ridings in which Jewish voters constitute a large presence: In Montreal, Mont-Royal, where incumbent Cotler should have little trouble winning re-election (Quebec's two other Jewish MPs, Raymonde Folco and Jacques Saada, have almost no Jewish constituents); in Ontario, Thornhill, Willowdale, Eglinton-Lawrence, St. Paul's, York Centre and Don Valley West.

Vernissage to feature Jewish-themed art

MONTREAL — The new Montreal Jewish Community Campus is planning a vernissage and reception presenting, for the first time, its permanent Judaic-themed art collection.

The gala evening will take place at the Montreal Jewish Community Campus Nov. 7, and will be hosted by event chairs Barbara and Stanley Plotnick. The collection features 36 works by 12 recognized local artists, which will permanently enhance the campus.

Vernissage participants will experience five floors of outstanding and thought-provoking artwork and have the opportunity to meet and speak with the artists, who will be in attendance.

Patrons of the evening's celebration will be presented with a limited-edition, full-colour, 44-page catalogue signed by each artist.

"This is an opportunity for our community, our leaders, the art world and the media to explore and enjoy art which has been specifically commissioned to accentuate the warmth and welcoming atmosphere of the Montreal Jewish Community Campus," said Stanley Plotnick, "as well as to reflect the Jewish themes inscribed throughout the building, in response to the missions of our community organizations."

An open call allowed 150 artists to send in their proposals and responses to the Judaic themes. The impressive list of proposals was narrowed down to 12, focusing on seven biblical themes, as defined in Jewish law and literature.

The artists utilized a variety of materials to express their perspectives, including bronze, steel and glass sculptures, marble floor mosaics, painting and photography.

This collection was made possible through the generosity of the Levy family of Montreal.

Ex-Winnipeger cast in new teen TV series

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Richard Kahan is on the verge of stardom. The former Winnipegger has been cast in a new half-hour TV series that debuted on the FOX network in the United States and in Europe on Sept. 17.

Edgemont, which won't be aired in Canada until January, is a teen drama/comedy about high school students growing up in a town outside Vancouver and their friendships and relationships, the young actor explains.

"I play Gil Kurvers, a troubled 16-year-old who does whatever he can to get what he wants, and he doesn't care who gets hurt in the process," says Kahan. "Viewers will see his conniving ways, but they will also see his more vulnerable side as the series progresses."

A graduate of the Seven Oaks school division's Hebrew Bilingual program in Winnipeg, Kahan, 20, has been training as an actor for 12 years. He began his training in classes at the Manitoba Theatre for Young People (MTYP).

"My parents enrolled me in acting classes because I was an outgoing kid," he recalls. "Right from the beginning, it felt right. There was nothing else I would rather do. While my friends would be going to play basketball, I would be going to acting classes."

After one year at MTYP, Kahan moved over to the Prairie Theatre Exchange (PTE) school. Over the years, he did a fair amount of work for PTE and at the Fringe Festival, as well as some commercials and movies here.

After graduating from Garden City Collegiate two years ago, he was preparing to go to Toronto where he had been accepted into York University's acting program. But before going, he went to Vancouver to audition for an acting school there.

"I fell in love with Vancouver," he says. "I talked to people in acting in Vancouver and Toronto and learned that the volume of work was about equal.

"I was working for a Blockbuster video outlet in Winnipeg. It was easy enough to get a transfer to a Vancouver outlet."

Once in Vancouver, Kahan hired an agent and started the rounds of auditions for parts. For Edgemont, he originally auditioned for the role of one of the older characters, but was encouraged to try out for the role of one of the 16-year-olds instead.

After a couple of weeks, he and another actor were called back to audition again for the character. Three weeks later, he received the bad news. He didn't get the part. But two weeks later still, he was called back to audition for the role of Gil Kurvers.

Kahan reports that 13 episodes of the series have already been shot and shooting is scheduled to begin on 13 more in October.

Winnipeg Jewish history inspiration for novels

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Noted Winnipeg authors Carol Matas and Allan Levine have both looked back into Winnipeg Jewish history for the inspiration for their latest novels.

Levine's new novel, Sins of the Suffragette, which was launched here on Oct.11, is a sequel to The Blood Libel, in which Levine first introduced Sam Klein, his pre-World War I Winnipeg Jewish detective. Sins of the Suffragette is set in Winnipeg in 1914, two years after the first book.

"In this book, Sam has married Sarah from the first book," the author says. "Being a former prostitute, Sarah is not so happy as a housewife."

The action takes place against the backdrop of a real Nelly McClung-led suffragette rally that took place here at the time. A local suffragette is found murdered and her husband is charged with killing her. Sam Klein doesn't believe he did it, and during the investigation, Klein delves into the women's movement, the opium trade and spiritualism, all prominent in that era. Levine also explores different aspects of morality and the conflict between the new immigrants and the resident majority.

"There is this notion that Canada has always been a tolerant, multicultural country," says Levine, a teacher at St. John-Ravenscourt School, a private school in Winnipeg. "My students think that way. I disabuse them of that notion. Nelly McClung was not so saintly."

Rebecca, Carol Matas' new novel, was launched on Oct. 19. This novel is set in Winnipeg in 1912 and, Matas says, is based in part of her own family's story.

Her grandmother's family, the Bernsteins, began their life in Canada as farmers at the Hirsch Colony in Saskatchewan. When a fire destroyed their home, Matas' great-grandparents were forced to move to Winnipeg with their 13 children and many grandchildren. Because no one in the family had any skills other than what they had learned on the farm, they found themselves destitute, and some of the younger children had to be placed in foster homes. This was before the Winnipeg Jewish Orphanage was established.

In Rebecca, the title character is a Jewish girl whose poverty-stricken family puts her in a Ukrainian foster home. Rebecca has to deal with the conflict between her real family and her foster family. The novel also explores her friendship with Sophie, the foster family's daughter.

This is the first time that Matas has set a historical novel in Winnipeg.

Next spring, she has another novel coming out, The War Within. It is centred around a Jewish character living in Mississippi during the Civil War. The War Within is being published jointly in Canada and the United States. Matas is hopeful about finding an American publisher for Rebecca as well.

Syria will pay for Hezbollah: IDF

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence officials are in the process of formulating a recommendation to strike at Syrian interests and targets in Lebanon if Damascus continues to allow Hezbollah and Palestinian groups to attack Israel along the Lebanese border.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak has, up until now, resisted adopting a military response and continues to use diplomacy – via the United States, the United Nations and others – to try and bring pressure to bear on Syria and Lebanon to prevent further attacks on Israel from Lebanese territory.

Last Sunday, an Israel Defence Forces unit that was guarding workers who were constructing a border fence came under fire near the Zra'it moshav; this was the fourth attack along the Israel-Lebanon border in the past three weeks. The IDF returned fire and no one was injured in the incident.

Using a variety of channels over the past few weeks, Israel has warned Syria that the continuation of attacks against Israel could lead to an escalation of the situation in the region. The issue was raised in talks between Syrian President Bashar Assad, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and Jordan's King Abdullah.

Defence sources said Assad was seriously misinterpreting the situation if he believed that such attacks could be continued with impunity. "The Syrians must understand that limited confrontations can also lead to a limited war," said one source. "In the final analysis, we will have to respond."

In recent weeks, Syrian support for Hezbollah has been on the upswing, both in public statements and in behind-the-scenes contacts. This has led to increased activity by Hezbollah and Palestinian guerrillas against Israeli targets along the border. Hezbollah has also made no attempt to control Lebanese protesters who gather at the Fatma Gate along the border to throw stones at the IDF. Israel attributes this to a lack of Syrian effort to restrain activity along the border.

In response to Lebanon's refusal to try to contain Hezbollah actions against Israel, Jerusalem has been pressuring the United States to include Lebanon on the list of states that abet terrorism. Syria is currently on the list and is, therefore, subject to American sanctions, including being barred from receiving U.S. aid.

"[Lebanese Prime Minister] Rafik Hariri will come to learn the meaning of such a step, which will take his country back 20 years," said one senior defence source.

Barak to meet Clinton after U.S. elections

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak does not expect to travel to Washington this week and only plans to meet President Bill Clinton after the U.S. presidential election, an aide to the prime minister said yesterday.

Barak will meet with Clinton during the course of his scheduled trip to the United States to address the annual general assembly of the United Jewish Communities (UJC), which opens in Chicago on Nov. 10.

Barak's aides do not believe that Clinton is ready to announce plans to upgrade Israel's designation to that of a "strategic ally" of the United States prior to the U.S. election, noting that the American administration wants a strategic alliance with Israel to be linked to progress on the diplomatic front. Given the deep freeze in the peace process, it is unlikely that Israel will get the coveted designation, according to one aide.

Israel is currently designated a major non-NATO ally of the United States, a status that was once unique to Israel, but is now also assigned to Egypt and Jordan, as well as other countries. Israel wants a higher designation, hoping it would open the way for greater access to U.S. military technology.

Acting Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami was to travel to Washington Wednesday to meet with U.S. National Security Adviser Sandy Berger and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. Ben-Ami was in Paris earlier this week to meet with European Union and Russian leaders.

Barak has continued with his "telephone diplomacy," which is geared toward preventing international recognition for any unilateral declaration of statehood by the Palestinians. The prime minister has also been seeking support to pressure Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat into abiding by the agreements reached at the Sharm al-Sheikh summit earlier this month.

In his talks with foreign leaders, Barak has stressed that he has not abandoned the peace process and is still committed to it. Over the weekend, Barak spoke with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Jordan's King Abdullah.

During Sunday's cabinet meeting, Barak praised the United States and Egypt for their efforts to convince Arafat to implement the Sharm al-Sheikh understandings.

What did the Pope know and when did he know it?

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — After 11 months of work investigating the Vatican's role during the Holocaust, a panel of scholars is pressing the Holy See to open up more archives.

The call comes during a report issued last week by the panel, made up of three Jews and three Catholics, that raises 47 questions about the papacy's wartime record – but offers little new evidence about several disputed topics, including the behaviour of the wartime pope, Pius XII.

The report does not leave much hope that questions about how much Pius did to combat the Holocaust will be answered soon.

"A scrutiny of these volumes of Vatican documents does not put to rest significant questions about the role of the Vatican during the Holocaust," the panel wrote in its introduction to the report, available on the Web at www.bnaibrith.org.

"The bottom line is that in order to carry out the debate" of the Vatican's wartime role "to a more mature level, the Vatican should begin to make available to reputable scholars all the documentary evidence that it has at its disposal," said University of Toronto scholar Michael Marrus, and one of the Jewish members of the panel.

The issue of Pius XII's wartime actions is the most pressing one addressed by the panel, which scoured 11 published volumes of archival material edited between 1965 and 1981.

The Vatican and the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultation established the panel last year.

Among the questions raised in the report concerning Pius XII:

- Are there documents relating to discussions in 1938 involving Pius, then known as Vatican Secretary of State Eugenio Pacelli, about the Vatican's reaction to Kristallnacht?
- Is there confirmation of a news story that the pope intervened with the leader of Vichy France, Marshal Petain, to stop the deportation of French Jews?
- What discussion was there in the Vatican regarding the pope's response to several appeals from the Archbishop of Berlin calling on Pius to publicly appeal to halt the deportations of the Jews of Berlin?

The Vatican says plans for Pius XII's beatification – the final step before sainthood – are under way, even though some charge that he was an anti-Semite who failed to help Jews during the Holocaust.

Several of the questions in the report relate to Pius XII's actions before and during the Holocaust. But that issue is only one of many raised in the report.

Others include why a project financially supported by U.S. Jews to obtain Brazilian visas for Catholics of Jewish origin failed; and how did the Vatican react as early as 1942 to the information it knew about the mass murder of Jews in extermination camps?

In Rome last week, the panel met with several Vatican officials, but did not meet with the Pope or with officials from the Vatican secretary of state, despite requests to do so.

Vatican officials appear to be debating whether they want to open the archives or keep the records sealed.

One source close to the process told JTA that while it is unlikely that the Vatican will open all of the archives, it might agree to furnish additional documents referred to in the published volumes.

Vatican documents are generally sealed for 100 years, but at least one exception to this rule was made last century, the report noted.

'Scared the fighting will erupt into something bigger'

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Tensions have heightened following the Oct. 26 suicide bombing in Kfar Darom in which one IDF soldier was wounded.

As the fighting between Palestinians and Israelis continued into its fourth week, fears that the Palestinians might resume suicide bombings as an extreme means of attacking Israel were widespread.

"I'm afraid Hamas and Islamic Jihad will step up attacks in Israel," said Jonah Schwartz, an Internet marketing representative. "And unfortunately, it looks like they have the explicit support of the Palestinian Authority."

While Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the Kfar Darom incident, Israeli papers noted the PA's silence on the matter and the evaluation by the Israeli defence establishment that the PA gives at least implied support for the operation.

The paper Hatzofeh reported that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat is kept informed about the terrorist organization's doings. The Hamas Speaker in Gaza, Mahmoud Zahar, told Hatzofeh that on a daily basis there is a meeting of the committee monitoring the intifadah, comprising representatives of Fatah, the Tanzim, Hamas, Islamic Jihad and other PLO splinter groups.

At the meetings, rallies, demonstrations and other anti-Israel activities are planned and summaries are passed on to Arafat, Zahar told the paper.

OC Southern Command Maj.-Gen. Yomtov Samiya blamed the PA for the attack, in which 24-year-old Nabil Arair blew himself up metres from an IDF post. The IDF Speaker said the attack indicated "the PA's continued encouragement of violence and terror" and that Arafat "continues to perceive violence against civilians and soldiers as legitimate."

The PA did not issue a statement condemning the violence.

"I'm scared the fighting will erupt into something bigger," said Schwartz, 32.

"I hope things aren't going to explode here but from reading the paper and hearing what's going on, I just don't know," said Jerusalemite Miriam Lavine.

Lavine lives in the Katamonim neighbourhood of Jerusalem not far from Gilo, which for the last three weeks has been under fire from Palestinian gunmen in nearby Beit Jala.

She has not dramatically changed her way of life but Lavine said that she is scared.

"The shooting is just horrible. I can't sleep at night," said Lavine, 42.

The shootings on Gilo residents have become an almost daily occurrence. Residents have been told not to use lights in any room facing Beit Jala, to keep their blinds down after sundown, and to stay indoors after dark.

"To be frank, we simply try to stay away from home as much as possible," Tami Reuvieni, a resident of Hahabush Street, which was hit by bullets last week, told the Jerusalem Post. Reuvieni said she had no idea how long the fighting would last, adding, "all I know is that we are in firing range of Beit Jala."

In Beit Jala, Christian Arabs shared the same worries as the Gilo residents. "[My friend] is very worried," a Christian Arab resident of Beit Hanina, whose friend lives in Beit Jala, related to The CJN.

"[My friend] keeps his family indoors as much as possible." He said if the Palestinians try and take over his home to use it for shooting at Israelis that he will kill them at the front door.

While the violence slightly decreased last week, shooting incidents and other disturbances continued to rock the West Bank and Gaza. Hopes of reaching a peace agreement between the Palestinians and Israelis still didn't look promising at the end of last week when on Friday (Oct. 27), Hamas announced that every Friday after prayers at the mosques, will be "a day of rage" for actions against Israel.

"It's a shame the peace process has broken down," said Simon Marks, 25, who made aliyah last week. Despite the past weeks of violence, Marks is still optimistic that peace can reign in the region.

"I don't think a perfect peace can exist because there will always be extremists, but I think there can be a peace of the majority – with the extremists being the minority."

Marks said the current violence didn't deter him from moving to Israel. "I didn't think twice about making aliyah.

"There is always trouble in Israel, but it didn't make a difference. I wanted to live here," he told The CJN.

As for the prospect of further suicide bombings, Marks said because "people are more tense now and on higher alert" such attacks could happen but aren't that likely.

"More suicide bombs are a possibility now, but they are more likely to happen when it is calm and workers can return to Israel. It will be easier for terrorists to come into Israel then," he said.

Marks related that he was the only non-Israeli on his half-full flight from England to Israel.

In the last week, some 1,000 immigrants arrived from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia, with only 140 coming from the rest of the world, according to the Jewish Agency. From English-speaking countries, 13 people immigrated from the United States, four from England – among them Marks – and two from Canada.

Emunah Women of Canada join World Emunah in a Plea:

"Stop the Mortal Exploitation of Children"

We, the members of World Emunah, a Jewish women's organization devoted to the prevention of child abuse and violence against children cry out against the gravely dangerous exploitation of Palestinian children to serve political ends in the Middle East conflict – a flagrant violation of the human rights of the child.

We PLEAD to world governments and international organizations concerned with the welfare of children to condemn and bring to an instant halt

THIS UNCONSCIONABLE BEHAVIOR.

We hope and pray that the Palestinians will realize that violence will not solve conflicts, and that only dialogue and negotiations will bring peace to all concerned.

ANNOUNCING

THE BRONFMAN YOUTH FELLOWSHIPS IN ISRAEL 2001

For the fifteenth consecutive summer, a group of outstanding Jewish teenagers in the U.S. and Canada, coming from a wide variety of backgrounds and entering the twelfth grade of school, will be recipients of the Bronfman Youth Fellowships*. They will spend five fulfilling weeks of study, dialogue and travel in Israel.

The Bronfman Fellows will be selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the program's selection standard. Fellowship activities begin July 2nd, with a return from Israel August 8th. All meals will be kosher, and Sabbath activities will be in keeping with the sanctity of the day.

Based in Jerusalem, the Fellows will engage in an intense interaction with a diverse rabbinic faculty and counselors, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They will explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs ... meet with Amitei Bronfman, our Israel counterpart program ... take part, at a time of rapid change, in seminars with some of the country's leading political and cultural figures ... debate ideas and search for insights on the different ways to define oneself as a Jew today, all in an atmosphere of mutual respect and open dialogue.

The purpose: to return home with a new understanding of the myriad issues facing the Jewish people and the Jewish state, and a new appreciation of the need for dialogue among Jews of all kinds.

* Fellowships cover all expenses including roundtrip transportation between New York and Israel, room and board and travel in Israel.

Completed applications must be postmarked by January 31, 2001

Israel & the Jewish World

'It isn't real anti-Semitism'

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Henri Hajdenberg, the president of CRIF (the umbrella organization of French Jewry), says recent attacks on Jews and their institutions in his country have nothing to do with anti-Semitism.

"At first, before we knew who was behind the attacks, we feared this was a wave of anti-Semitism," he said. "But about 30 perpetrators have been arrested and it has become clear they are not from French society proper, but are new immigrants from Arab countries who live in the poorest neighbourhoods of France.

"The Muslim leadership has no interest in anti-Jewish disturbances – these immigrants do not have a positive image and disturbances of this nature don't serve the image Muslims want to cultivate ... There are Muslim fundamentalist organizations in France, but they are under the eye of the police and the security services, and have apparently been warned not to do anything."

When asked why France nevertheless topped the spate of attacks against Jews recently, Hajdenberg answered that "there is the relatively high percentage of Jews and Muslims in France. This is the largest Jewish community in Europe, and France also has a very large Muslim community." (France has 700,000 Jews and about 4 million Muslims.)

"Jewish institutions are prominent everywhere in France, and Jews are also very prominent in terms of their status in French society – unlike the Arab immigrants, who mostly live in poor neighbourhoods. This creates jealousy and frustration.

"Also, unlike in the United States, in some neighbourhoods there is physical proximity between Muslims and Jews."

On French government response, Hajdenberg says: "During the first week, Jewish institutions were not adequately protected. It seems the government and police were surprised by the wave [of attacks] – as indeed were we. But afterward, substantial protection was provided, and last week there were no attacks."

Hajdenberg said pictures from the Middle East have begun to lose their impact and because the police acted firmly 35 people were arrested.

Hajdenberg said that in conversations with French leaders, he has stressed "this is not a 'Jewish' problem. It must be treated as an attack on the French Republic and French democracy. Democracy must defend itself, not 'the Jews.' [The political leadership] definitely accepts this.

"Practically speaking, we must provide protection for every Jewish institution," he added. "We are also trying to establish long-term dialogue with the Arab and Muslim community in France."

Germany acts quickly to quell outbursts

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Anti-Semitic outbursts raged in Germany during the first week of violence in the Palestinian territories.

Very soon afterward, however, the anti-Semitic outburst was stifled.

Anti-Semitic acts perpetrated at the beginning of the current Middle East crisis ranged from the hurling of Molotov cocktails at a Dusseldorf synagogue, the desecration of a Jewish cemetery, synagogue and memorial site at the Buchenwald concentration camp, the sending of letter bombs to Jewish communal leaders in Germany, and stones thrown at a synagogue in Essen (where there is a memorial for local Jews who perished in the Holocaust).

"On Simchat Torah I was in synagogue, and there were about 30 percent fewer worshippers than in previous years," says Paul Spiegel, the present chair of the umbrella organization of Jewish communities in Germany. "Mothers are scared about sending their children to Jewish pre-school facilities, despite the fact that all Jewish communal organizations are guarded 24 hours a day."

Spiegel expresses satisfaction regarding responses shown both by Germany's government and local communities.

"A day after the attack against the synagogue in Dusseldorf, Chancellor Schroder arrived to express solidarity, and to emphasize that this [attack] doesn't reflect Germany's ways. Several demonstrations were held in Germany to denounce anti-Semitism. I can't remember another time when I received so many messages of encouragement from all sections of the public."

He clarified that he "shouldn't regret the fact that we've built a home in Germany. We are today the third largest [Jewish] community in Western Europe."

Oct. 24

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Ariel Sharon failed to agree on terms for a national unity government.

• Two Palestinians from the Old City of Jerusalem were sentenced to life imprisonment for the murder two years ago of Chaim Kerman. Kerman was stabbed more than 30 times on his way to morning prayers.

• Barak sent a security aide to meet with Yasser Arafat to convince him to stop the violence.

Oct. 25

• The IDF was called in to help flood victims in the Tel Aviv area after heavy rainstorms fell in the region. One boy from Yaffo drowned in the deluge.

• Morocco announced it would sever relations with Israel.

Oct. 26

• A Palestinian suicide bomber detonated the explosives he was carrying on a bicycle close to an IDF position near Gush Katif in the Gaza Strip, killing himself and lightly injuring an Israeli soldier manning the post. It was the first instance of a suicide bombing attack since the disturbances began in the territories on Sept. 29.

Oct. 27

• Representatives of Israeli Arab students demanded that the government force the universities to remove the ban on political protests imposed for the initial weeks of the new academic year, which begins on Sunday.

Ominous signs conflict has entered dangerous phase

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel faces the bleak prospect of a low-grade, open-ended war with the Palestinians – more bullets and bloodshed – unless both sides return to the negotiating table and settle their differences.

Last month's emergency meeting in Sharm al Sheikh called by U.S. President Bill Clinton was supposed to yield a ceasefire agreement to end the raging violence and restore the status quo ante in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. But the accord, signed by neither Ehud Barak nor Yasser Arafat, was basically a deadletter because the Palestinian leadership had already decided to prolong the unrest, the worst in three decades.

Since then, top-ranking Palestinian officials have declared unequivocally that their uprising, touched off by Ariel Sharon's needlessly provocative visit to the Temple Mount, will continue until Israel withdraws from the territories and the Palestinians achieve sovereignty and independence.

The seriousness of the present volatile situation is such that Jabril Rajoub, head of the Palestinian Authority's security apparatus in the West Bank, has gone on record as saying that the Palestinians will not return to "a peaceful coexistence with the occupation." This suggests that Arafat may be ready to embark on a protracted armed struggle – a retreat into ther past – to wrest statehood from Israel.

There are other ominous signs that the Arab-Israeli conflict has entered a new, extremely dangerous phase. Barak has suspended bilateral negotiations, while Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa has categorically pronounced the Oslo peace process to be "finished." Meanwhile, Ahmed Qureia, a senior Palestinian negotiator who was intimately involved in the secret talks that produced the groundbreaking 1993 Oslo pact, dropped yet another bombshell. He said that the resumption of talks should "be based on a new formula" minimizing the role of the United States – Israel's chief ally – and reflecting the predominant influence of the United Nations, the European Union, Russia and China, which generally tend to be pro-Arab. Israel, it is clear, will reject the Palestinian approach, setting the stage for heightened tension.

There is now a strong possibility that Arafat will act on his threat to declare unilateral Palestinian statehood on Nov. 15 or later. It is a popular demand he may no longer be able to resist after postponements in May 1999 and September 2000.

By way of reaction, the politically beleaguered Barak, whose parliamentary base has dwindled drastically since the failed Camp David summit in July, may yet annex settlement blocs in the West Bank containing 80 percent of the Jewish settlers, while carving out new borders within the framework of "unilateral separation."

If this should happen, the Palestinians will intensify the intifadah, which has already reached the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo. Though the disturbances tapered off last week, Israel is preparing for a confrontation that could last at least months. It could precipitate fresh suicide bombings, draw in Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, and, in a worst-case scenario, spark a catastrophic regional war.

There is no doubt that the uprising has dealt a stinging blow to Israel's important relationship with several Arab countries. Oman has closed its trade office in Tel Aviv and Qatar is considering doing so. As a result of the recent Arab summit in Cairo, which harshly condemned Israel and promised the Palestinians about $1 billion in aid, Morocco severed diplomatic ties with Israel, Tunisia shut its liaison office in Tel Aviv, and Egypt and Jordan froze relations with Israel.

The collapse of mutual trust between Israel and the Palestinians, as well as the inflammatory language of hate and denial voiced by many Palestinians of late, raises a troubling question: Did the positive spirit of the now-shattered Oslo peace process ever seep into the consciousness of the Palestinian masses?

If the process was only skin-deep, Israel could be on the cusp of a tragic war with the Palestinians that neither side can win.

Learning from the disturbances

BY ZE'EV SCHIFF

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

When did the Palestinians begin to get ready for the disturbances? There have been signs in recent weeks indicating that there had been preparations and that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat had just been waiting for an excuse to light the fire.

One of the signs was the hoarding of food in large quantities on instructions from above. Once every three weeks a boat arrived from Australia full of sheep and young calves for the Gaza Strip. In one week, however, three ships docked with the same cargo for the Gaza Strip.

It is also worth going back to the warning by Jibril Rajoub, the head of Preventive Security in the West Bank, and paying attention to its details.

The statement was made to the Associated Press agency and to the Jerusalem Post on the day Sharon visited the Temple Mount and was published on September 28.

Among other things, Rajoub said: "The disturbances will not be limited to Jerusalem this time but will break out everywhere in the territories and lead to a strong response from the Arab states as well. The Palestinians will not try to quell the riots because they are the result of an aggressive provocation."

That is exactly what happened.

This warning contradicts the claim that the visit by Likud Chairman Ariel Sharon to the Temple Mount was approved after Rajoub told him that the visit would go by quietly if Sharon did not enter the mosques. Clearly, the public statement was significant and it should have been believed.

The irony is that Israel owes Arafat a vote of thanks. Arafat has brought us back to our true strategic reality.

This happened to us once before.

The victory in the Six-Day War convinced many people in Israel to believe that power can stand on its own. This was so until the Yom Kippur War shook us out of our illusions.

This time, as a result of the disturbances Arafat has brought down upon us, we have woken up from our visions of being a great power. Many people realize that despite our considerable military might, Israel could slide into a civil war that will be a new version of the 1948 War of Independence.

The conclusion: Israel is still a nation at war and it should act accordingly as it considers its own interests and the extent of its concessions to our enemies. And furthermore, a nation at war cannot be run by organizations like the "mothers-of-soldiers" – who were so instrumental in stirring public opinion against the IDF presence in Lebanon.

During the period of the intifadah, we learned that in many wars, and in particular wars on a slow burner, the media play an important role. They are a form of new artillery. They do not fire ordinary shells.

A sophisticated army needs to include the issue of media involvement in its evaluations of the situation and make use of professionals.

Good "explaining" is no guarantee of victory. But without it, it is much harder even for the side that has good reasons to fight. The media also play an important role in internal "explaining."

A nation cannot face a war if its population does not know what its children are fighting for and why they are being killed, or does not believe that it is doing the right thing.

During the recent disturbances, Israeli news correspondents, much to our embarrassment, asked residents of Gilo after the firing on their neighborhood if they were thinking of evacuating their homes. No such questions were heard on the Palestinian side.

There can indeed be one good reason for the "time-out" in the peace talks: the continuation of the violence.

This is the situation at present without even declaring a time-out. Ultimately, we will get to the negotiating table even if we slide down the slippery slope into a widespread conflict with the Palestinians and a regional war. At the end of the hostilities, we will once again be talking with Arafat or his successor.

The Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa was right when he said that there have to be new rules for the negotiations when they begin again. Though not the ones he had in mind, and it is not Egypt who will make these rules.

It is worth noting that despite the time-out, there are various dialogues being conducted in the field.

For example, the understanding among the people who are dealing with drinking water that even if the violence continues, both sides must refrain from harming the water infrastructure because this is a humanitarian issue of the first degree.

Overall, the ones most likely to be harmed are the Palestinians, but clearly Israel is also not immune.

Egyptian daily criticizes PA as relations cool

By DANIEL SOBELMAN

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The state-affiliated Egyptian daily Al Gumhuria sharply accused the PA of ingratitude last week, confirming a trend of cooling relations between Egypt and the Palestinians.

The newspaper said the Palestinian Authority leadership failed to appreciate President Hosni Mubarak's efforts on its behalf. Heading his piece "Palestinians and Ingratitude," Al Gumhuria editor Samir Ragab wrote that Mubarak was leader of the group of Arab statesman who "boldly supported the Al-Aqsa intifadah."

Rajab, who has close ties to Mubarak, wrote that Egypt's president has never stopped making "sacrifices to provide shelter to Palestinians … to help them, to defend them from killings and massacres, and to fight for their rights.

"Although it would be expected that the Palestinians, all of their organizations and sub-groups, would at the very least offer a prayer to give thanks to Almighty Allah who has provided the Arab people with a leader such as Hosni Mubarak, a man who has devoted his whole life to the Arab cause, the Palestinians have turned their backs on Egypt's leader," Rajab wrote.

Colourful fashions introduced at benefit for ovarian cancer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

More than 1,000 women (and a sprinkling of men) turned out for the 47th annual fall fashion show, silent auction and luncheon held recently by The Toronto Fashion Show Committee at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

The proceeds of the sold-out event will support The Familial Ovarian Cancer Clinic at the Princess Margaret Hospital, which officially opened last year. The funds will support research, and provide screening and care for patients with ovarian cancer.

Ovarian cancer is the fourth most frequent cause of death from cancer in women. More than 2,200 women will be diagnosed with ovarian cancer this year; 1,700 will die.

The Toronto Fashion Show Committee's goal for the next three to five years is to raise $3 million.

"It is important to increase awareness and educate women on ovarian cancer and the benefits of screening," said Ritasue Charlestein Fisher, a survivor of the disease.

On a video, she noted that "the staff and other patients at the Ovarian Cancer Clinic helped me get through the worst period of my life. I am truly grateful to them."

Many other survivors of ovarian cancer were present at the fashion show, which featured Escada's Fall/Winter 2000-2001 Collection from Europe titled, The Colour of Elegance – and coulorful it was.

The shockingly bright colours and pastels were shown to perfection by pony-tailed youthful looking models. The collection featured textural fabrics with a fresh flowing soft look. The emphasis was relaxed and casual.

There were embroidered skirts, soft leathers, beaded pants, sequined jeans, slinky cut-out dresses and a melding of form and colour.

Four main themes were highlighted in the collection – animals, jewel tones, pastels (cool lavender and pistachio) and the always-in-style black.

The Toronto Fashion Show Committee, originally known as the Golden Daffodils, is a voluntary organization.

Marilyn Denis of Citytv was the MC of the show. Also participating in the program were the event's co-chairs, Tracey Neziol and Monica Cosgrove, and Dr. Joan Murphy, head of the divisions of gynecology and gynecology-oncology of the University Health Network, Princes Margaret Hospital.

Don't miss the most gorgeous lipstick tube to grace the market in years. Estee Lauder has simply designed one of the most exquisite cylinders I have ever seen. The lipstick is good and the colour selection beautiful.

Hair:

Daniel Fiorio of Salon Daniel (79 Yorkville Ave.) says the hair shapes this season are definitely '70s inspired with a twist of sexy sophistication that looks like Christie Turlingtons' hairdo on a recent issue of Elle magazine.

The guru of colour technique, Joanne Skillin, also at Salon Daniel, says forget about two-tone and chunking. The winter look is monochromatic.

L'Oreal Professional launches Serie Expert – a unique haircare line that surpasses all expectations! It has six categories: colour, energy, repair, silver, control and powerdoze. Each personalized solution provides visible results. It is so nice when we get the results we are promised.

Colour Extend Total Recharge inner hair fuel from Redken will give your hair super shine and vibrancy.

Fragrance:

Manifesto is an elegant combination of familiar scents from our gardens and everyday life. The floral scent changes unexpectedly into a sensual wood – very interesting.

Ralph Lauren's new fragrance is so sexy. It's floral, energetic and very fresh. His inspiration was his young daughter Dylan and her friends.

The House of Chopard treats us with a gorgeous gift set that is perfect for the holidays. Its name is Satin Dreams. This pale blue and silver satin drawstring pouch adorned with silver ornaments encloses a diamond shaped bottle of Wish Eau de Parfum with shimmering body veil to match. Its scent is dreamlike and very seductive.

Gucci Rush for men is a provocative and savvy scent. The design is as cool as it gets. The transparent bottle is clear plastic surrounded by white metal and contained in a clear sleeve – a perfect gift for your special guy.

Dressing up for Casual Fridays

News Canada

The business casual look, once restricted to dress-down Fridays, is becoming the daily dress code across Canada. A recent Omnitel survey reveals that 41 percent of working Canadians now wear business casual every day.

The business casual trend spread across North America with the rise of dot.com companies. But now it has been adopted by even the traditionally conservative financial and insurance industries, says Lisa Rogers, fashion consultant on CITY TV's City Line and host of a series of retailer seminars on business casual basics for today's workplace.

Making the transition from corporate uniform to fashionable business casual is a challenge for office workers, says Rogers. Many mistakenly carry their weekend wardrobe into the work week.

"Weekend wear is simply not appropriate for the office and it doesn't provide the flexibility that employees in many professions require," says Rogers.

In fact, 52 percent of those surveyed admit that they were only somewhat or not very satisfied with their current business casual wardrobe, which consists mostly of jeans, T-shirts and other sporty weekend casuals.

According to Rogers, business casual is careful casual, and like the formal business wardrobes of the past, it relies on good quality, well-made pieces. "You might still have a suit in your wardrobe, but it's how you put it together with other pieces that create a look that is both polished and relaxed," says Rogers.

Fabric plays a key role in a sharp business casual look, suggests Rogers. In fact, recent innovations in fabric – such as wool blends, knitwears, silks and techno fibres – have helped designers to create clothing that is comfortable yet professional.

According to Rogers, a fashionable business casual wardrobe starts with eight essentials:

- An updated classic three-piece suit (jacket, pants and skirt) in a dark neutral colour – dark colours look more polished, are slimming and make it easy to mix and match. This suit isn't much different from the traditional office suit, it's how you wear it and how you accessorize it that makes the difference.
- A white shirt is a basic piece that is always chic and fashionable. It also looks smart and sophisticated on days when no jacket is required or if you choose to take your jacket off through the day. The shirt should have simple clean lines, a slim fit and a moderate sized collar which gives a newer look when worn open and outside the jacket.
- A long-sleeve or three-quarter-length sleeve turtleneck or crew neck is the perfect choice to give your suit a more casual look or looks good on its own. Soft-touch, affordable fabric blends with cashmere or silk give the look and feel of luxury. And here is an opportunity to inject some colour – think of rich red, classic navy or soft heather colours. Add a little texture or a soft subtle pattern.
- A cardigan is both a basic that helps deal with temperature changes and a good alternative to the suit jacket. If you opted for a more subtle colour choice in your turtleneck, go for cherry red or burnt orange in your cardigan.
- Invest in another pair of pants – try a classic pair of pants in a tweed or wool blend fabric – navy, black or grey flannel go with almost anything. A pant less dressy than the one that is part of your suit purchase will give a more eclectic look.
- Dresses are back and provide a feminine alternative for your wardrobe. The latest fabrication allow for soft draping and the length should be at or just below the knee. Make sure that it works well under a suit jacket or cardigan.
- Accessories are a cost-effective way to update any wardrobe. Accessorizing for business casual should be fashion-forward but minimalist – pearls, scarves and even fur and animal prints (for shoes or purses) are good final touches.
- Last but not least you must have a good bag and shoes. Substitute your briefcase for a sleek leather tote. Trade in your pumps for a pair of sling-backs.

Capturing the message on film

Photoshooting in the fashion world can be a tough crowd to please. Comte has given life to models by many well-known couturiers and designers: Ungaro, Chanel, Armani, Dolce & Gabbana and other prestigious names.

His well-accustomed experience with conveying top models as more than just objects is what prompted the Swiss watch company, Longines, to hire Comte to creatively execute their latest international campaign.

Advertising campaigns can be a tough job for photographers, especially when the advertiser is depending on the visual to communicate a strong message. In the case of Longines, the brand has always been symbolic of elegance, but the new campaign has a very modern day take:

"Elegance is an attitude". How do you capture such a message on film? The advertising campaign is referring to "attitude" not as aggressive but rather charismatic. As seen in magazines and billboards all around the world, Comte successfully accomplished to convey the essence of "Elegance is an attitude" as interpreted by Longines.

What was the key to poignant photos for this campaign? Comte was graced to work with ideal subjects to express this state. A glimpse of the photo session shows Comte working in harmony with these contemporary personalities who are doing a good job confirming this concept can be true.

German born Tajana Patitz is a top model familiar to the public without being overexposed. Pedro Diniz is a Formula 1 racing driver who is a thrilling sportsman yet a grounded person. A statement defining new standards of the unthinkable has been made - Elegance is nor more nor less an attitude.

It is not easy for a photographer to transfer such an intricate message to film. Comte is reputed as one of the best, reinforced by adding this campaign to his long list of notable projects.

You may be used to seeing Comte's work in editorial pages of international magazines, you will now see his mastery in the same publications through a different angle thanks to the Longines message, "Elegance is an attitude".

New cancer treatment to be tested in Toronto

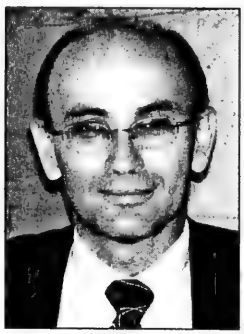
By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Clinical trials for a new cancer treatment developed at the Weizmann Institute of Science are set to begin within the next few months in Toronto, among other places.

Avigdor Scherz — a physical chemist who developed the treatment with Weizmann colleague Yoram Salomon of the institute's biological regulation department — spoke recently about his research on Cancer Therapy with Light and Chlorophyll at a Weizmann Women & Science program held at the home of Barbara Bregman.

The program was the first of three for the 2000-2001 year. In upcoming talks, Dr. Raymond Stein will discuss Technological Advances in Laser Vision Correction, and Dr. Jeffrey Dover will talk about Lasers: Revolutionizing the Treatment of Skin Diseases for the Aging Face.

Scherz' new cancer treatment uses a chlorophyll-based compound known as tookad (the Hebrew word for flame), developed by Dutch pharmaceutical company Steba Beheer NV. It will be tested at Princess Margaret Hospital and the Toronto Hospital, likely in cases of prostate and breast cancers.



Avigdor Scherz

The treatment may minimize side effects and be more specific than some other approaches, Scherz said. In animal trials, it has yielded promising results on solid tumours such as renal cancer and melanoma (skin cancer).

Melanoma is "a very challenging cancer" that is difficult to treat with chemotherapy and radiation, said Scherz. "Somehow we thought we'd be able to destroy it with our drug, and that was the case." Over 80 percent of the animals in preliminary tests were completely cured of large tumours, he said.

The treatment involves the injection of a drug that becomes toxic when exposed to infrared light, which can penetrate deep into the body with the use of a fiberoptic light guide. Older forms of photodynamic therapy (PDT) – therapy involving the use of light – were effective only against relatively flat and thin tumours.

Because of the vascular structure of solid tumours, which is different from that of normal tissue, the drug stays in the tumour longer, leaving a window of time to treat it with light after it is gone from normal tissue, Scherz explained.

The drug stays toxic only as long as light is shining on it, he added, and the result is destruction of the tumour entity, with minimal damage to surrounding tissue.

When you have a solid tumour, explained Scherz, not all the cells are accessible to the same extent to chemotherapy or radiation. One problem with chemo is that the drugs stay in the body for a long time, he noted, and patients must avoid light to keep from getting burned.

Unlike chemo and surgery, PDT can be repeated many times, he said.

The drug is cleared from the body within three or four hours, and can be used repeatedly, Scherz said. It may be useful in the case of widespread metastases as well as on solid tumour, but there's no guarantee, he added.

Preliminary experiments also indicated a reduced incidence of metastases, he noted. If the treatment actually induces some sort of immune response, he said, it may lead to a vaccine.

Younger Jewish teens using harder drugs, activist says

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An increasing number of illegal drug users in Montreal are both younger and Jewish, says a local drug abuse educator and activist.

Barry Salis has first-hand knowledge of such trends. A former drug user himself, he's now the director of outreach services for Project Pride, a non-sectarian, drop-in drug abuse prevention and intervention centre.

Located at the Queen Elizabeth Health Complex in NDG, the centre was founded locally 11 years ago, through the efforts of Rabbi Ronnie Fine of Chabad.

"We're seeing younger and younger kids coming in," says Salis of the 300 drug users who visit Project Pride each month. And nearly half of them – 45 percent, according to the centre's intake forms – are Jewish, he adds.

Project Pride's clients either come looking for a place to "detox," or have come out of a drug rehab needing follow-up guidance and counselling, says Salis.

While illegal drug use is becoming increasingly rampant among high school and CEGEP students, both in and outside the Jewish community, Salis says it's their increasing use of "hard" drugs that is most unsettling for him.

"What's alarming me is the number of younger kids now coming in with severe drug problems," he says. "I'm talking about crack cocaine here, which kids can get physically addicted to right away."

Actor Kirk Douglas makes Bible stories interesting for kids

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

People don't think of movie stars writing books for children. But that is just what a very famous actor, Kirk Douglas did, when he wrote Young Heroes of the Bible; a book for family sharing (Simon & Schuster, 1999).

And he did it very well.

You might not have heard of Kirk Douglas, but he has been an actor for a very long time. He even won a special Academy Award for lifetime achievement. His son, Michael Douglas, is also a famous actor.

In the beginning of the book, Kirk, who is Jewish, explains that he wrote the book because he remembers how he hated Sunday school, and how he wished that the teachers would make the stories in the Bible more interesting.

Whether or not you agree with Douglas, you will enjoy Young Heroes of the Bible. He talks about what people we read about in the Bible were like when they were kids.

For instance, when Abraham was a little boy, he had a lot of questions. But every time he asked his father or his teacher, he was told to keep quiet and not bother the grown-ups. Only one person (not exactly a person) listened to him – and that was God.

Douglas points out that the characters in the Bible were not perfect. Joseph, for instance, was "a spoiled brat," who kept boasting to his brothers about the wonderful things that would happen to him, and the beautiful coat their father made for him.

He couldn't have prevented what would happen, Douglas says, but Joseph still shouldn't have been boastful.

And how did David learn to throw the slingshot that killed Goliath? Well, he practised when he was looking after his father's sheep.

The book also talks about other heroes, like Miriam, who was willing to risk everything to help her baby brother Moses, and Rebecca, who took a lot of time (and a lot of energy) feeding the camels, even before she fed her guest.

One of the best parts of this book is that it is really very funny. Douglas talks a lot about what he thought and did when he was a little boy. For instance, when he heard that Pharaoh decided to kill all the Hebrew babies, he told his sisters that if their parents had lived then, they wouldn't have been born.

Being sisters, they had to tell him "you wouldn't have been born either, stupid."

Another time, he wonders whether noserings get in the way when you have a cold.

You will really enjoy this book, and you can even have fun reading it and talking about it with your parents. Especially if they like Kirk Douglas.

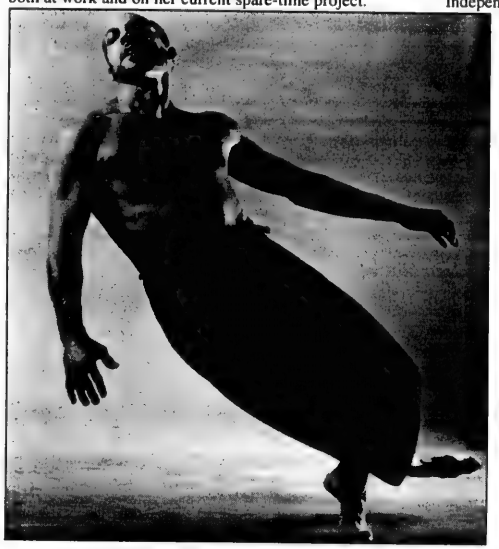
Sick Kids nurse resurrects Wiesel play

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judy Kopelow says she just wants to make a difference.

The critical care nurse, who works at the Hospital for Sick Children and in a part-time fund-raising position at the Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario, is doing just that, both at work and on her current spare-time project.



Dancer, choreographer Allen Kaeja.

As part of Holocaust Education Week, Kopelow is producing and directing Ani Maamin: a song lost and found again, a rarely seen work of Elie Wiesel with music by French composer Darius Milhaud.

The 90-minute French cantata/oratorio, with accompanying narrative in English, will be performed on Nov. 6 at 8 p.m., in the Ettore Mazzoleni Concert Hall of the Royal Conservatory of Music, 273 Bloor St. W. Entry is free, but seating is limited to 250. (To RSVP, call 416-787-1060.)

The performance will be followed by a brief discussion, and a reception at the Windsor Arms Hotel.

Ani Maamin (I Believe) tells the story of patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob confronting God and reflecting on their own experiences in the wake of the Holocaust. The title refers to the Maimonidean creed that became a virtual anthem for doomed concentration camp inmates. "It is the story of the strength of the human spirit," says Kopelow.

Evan Solomon of CBC's Hot Type plays Jacob; Allen Kaeja, co-director of Kaeja d'Dance and Fringe Festival of Independent Dance Artists, is Isaac; and German-born orchestral conductor Harry Hurwitz is Abraham.

A former psychology professor, Hurwitz was raised in South Africa and was involved as a student in the anti-apartheid movement.

The trio bring different ways of expression and of looking at the world, Kopelow explained. Their roles are speaking parts only.

Solomon, who has a master's degree in theology and is in the preliminary stages of working on a Holocaust-related book, will lead what he hopes will be a "fascinating and lively" post-performance discussion.

The piece poses very complex questions such as why evil exists and why innocents have to suffer, he noted. For Solomon, what's important is "to wrestle meaning out of this."

He is also intrigued by the role the Holocaust plays in times of trouble, such as the recent violence in Israel, he said.

Guest soloists in Ani Maamin include Cantor Efraim Sapir. The production's musical directors, Fabio Mastrangelo of Virtuosi di Toronto, and Sabatino Vacca, will provide piano accompaniment.

Kopelow originally staged the production as a graduate student in comparative religion at the University of Manitoba in 1978, five years after Ani Maamin's Carnegie Hall debut for the Centennial Concert of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. Her minimal background in drama – a one-year stint as a part-time theatre apprentice – didn't deter her.

Judy Kopelow

"I read it, and I felt that people should see it," Kopelow recalled recently at the Conservatory, amid the strains of vocal and instrumental music.

"The words are so beautiful," she said, referring to a dialogue between the patriarchs and an angel sent by God.

Mezzo soprano Laura Pilarsky, a post-graduate Conservatory student who sings in Ani Maamin, said she believes the spoken text enhances the emotional quality of the work.

Rereading Ani Maamin this year, Kopelow was motivated to stage it again, something she's wanted to do for the past two decades.

A Winnipeg native whose parents did not experience the Holocaust, Kopelow grew up with "a strong sense that being Jewish and being Canadian were two wonderful things."

Kaeja, whose late father was part of the partisan movement and an Auschwitz survivor, found the script "very powerful. Every time I read it, it digs in deeper. It reaches inside my core and inside my soul." It wasn't until he became a father himself that he began to examine Holocaust issues in his work, he said.

Kopelow was driving home one day when she heard Kaeja discuss his two Holocaust-based dance trilogies on her car radio. She quickly decided to ask him to participate in the project.

"There was something about Judy," Kaeja recalled, that made him accept her offer.

QUÉBÉC ACADEMIC TO LECTURE IN YIDDISH ON MONTREAL JEWISH HISTORY

Québécois anthropologist Pierre Anctil, who has expended much energy building bridges between the francophone and Jewish communities in la belle province, is slated to lecture in Yiddish about Montreal's Jewish history in the key period of 1900 to 1920.

Anctil, who is not Jewish, is basing the talk on Le Montreal juif d'autrefois, his 1997 French-language translation of Montreal fun Nekhta, a 1947 book by Israel Medres, one-time staff writer for the former Yiddish newspaper Kanader Adler. Anctil's translation has received considerable press attention in Quebec.

Medres's granddaughter, Vivian Felsen of Toronto, has just published an English translation of the book under the title Montreal of Yesterday (Vehicule Press), thus providing the occasion for Anctil's visit.

Hear Anctil at the Jewish Book Fair, Sunday Nov. 5, 1:30 p.m. $3. Leah Posluns Theatre. Felson's book launch immediately follows the lecture at 2:30 p.m.

Holocaust Drama: The Friendly Spike Theatre Band presents Father & Daughter, a one-woman play by Marlene Charney, Ruth Ruth and Ken Innes, with music composed by Heinz Klein. Presented in conjunction with Holocaust Education Week, this bittersweet work explores the devastation that Auschwitz wreaked upon the lives of survivors and their children.

The Great Hall Centre, Dovercourt Studio, 1087 Queen St. W. (at Dovercourt). Nov. 1 to 5, 8 p.m. $10; Sunday 2:30 p.m., PWYC. 416-516-4740. E-mail friendlyspike@globalserve.net.

Persons wishing to express, in a creative context, how the Holocaust affected their lives are invited to perform at an Open Stage Community Cabaret, Nov. 3 and 4, 10 p.m.

Russian-Jewish Memoir: Published in 1910, Rememberings by Pauline Wengeroff, is supposed to be the only known book-length memoir of the everyday life of a Jewish woman in 19th-century Russia. The memoir is a dramatic literary narrative that details the life of a Jewish girl and woman in an era when the foundations of faith and tradition were eroding.

Henny Wenkart's skilful translation brings Wengeroff's tale of wandering and struggle to life. The Vienna-born, Harvard-educated doctor of philosophy presents a reading and discussion of Wengeroff's work in conjunction with the Jewish Book Fair, the Morris Winchevsky School and the United Jewish People's Order.

Sunday Nov. 5, 10:30 a.m. Leah Posluns Theatre. Admission free.

Cultural Perspective: The Bloor JCC, the committee for Yiddish and the Friends of Yiddish present the fifth annual The Holocaust, A Cultural Perspective. The program features a reading from The Diary of Anne Frank by Maggie Blake of Stratford fame, introduced by Al Waxman; a dance choreographed by Serge Bennathan; a reading in Yiddish and English by actor Alon Nashman of a passage from writer Chava Rosenfarb; and contributions by Rick Salutin, Steve Paikin, David Wall and others.

Play pokes fun at modern Jewish family

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jest a Second is a play that squeezes laughs out of the plight of a "modern" Jewish family – a therapist son, Joel, who is gay; a mother who asks her son's friend if he is married before she knows the truth; and a son-in-law who converts to Judaism and is more observant than the parents, yet manages to deliver a message of tolerance as well.

"Some people will hate you because you are Jewish and some will hate you because you are gay," says Joel's mother Miriam (Marion Hirschberg), near the final curtain of the Encore Entertainment production that recently ran at the Studio Theatre, Toronto Centre for the Arts.

The comedy by James Sherman has a pregnant woman (Liz Best) who gives birth during the play. "Joel isn't the only one coming out tonight," she says.

It also includes Bob (Mario D'Alimonte), the convert who won't start dinner on Friday before 6:23 p.m., when the sun sets, and the father (Herb Goldstein), who tells his son-in-law that "we wouldn't have these problems if you didn't turn Jewish."

"It wouldn't be my first choice," says Marion of her son's decision to be gay (he already has a non-Jewish wife who is divorcing him, and two children), but she is openly happy that Joel's new soulmate, Randy, is a pediatrician. "At last we have a doctor in the family."

Directed and produced by Merle Garbe, Jest a Second delivers laughs at a rapid rate, especially when Randy dresses up as a woman in an attempt to fool Joel's parents.

One of the complications is that Randy is also the mohel for Liz and Bob's new baby, an assignment he knows will mean trouble, but he is determined that Joel's best course is to tell the truth.

Paris examines memory in new book, Long Shadows

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In her new book, Erna Paris cites an observation made by the British novelist George Orwell in Ninety Eighty Four: "He who controls the present controls the past. He who controls the past controls the future."

Memory, as historians well know, can be shaped by selection or manipulation. This has always been so.

In Long Shadows: Truth, Lies and History (Random House), Paris, a Canadian writer, intelligently examines this contentious issue within the context of national remembrance.

As the 21st century begins, nations from Germany and South Africa to France and Japan wrestle with what she describes as their "unassimilated history."

These countries are trying to come to terms with national shame, be it Germany's role in the making of the Holocaust or France's wartime legacy of collaboration with the Nazis.

Erna Paris

The driving force that compelled Paris to write this thoughtful, sometimes gripping book was, in a word, amnesia. In the 1960s, when she was a resident of France, she was struck by the fact that her friends and neighbours hewed to a skewed view of the German occupation.

"There was a complete silence about the fate of the French Jews," she writes, referring to the deportation of some 75,000 Jews.

> 'The gate of memory... has creaked open a little wider'

This glaring omission prompted Paris to ask herself a question that goes to the heart of the matter: "Who gets to decide what happened yesterday, then to tell the tale?"

The Germans had to face that uncomfortable issue as soon as the Third Reich had fallen into history's dustbin. In the immediate aftermath of World War II, they tried to suppress their ugly past. They were aided and abetted by Western nations fighting Communism. But as young Germans rejected the values of their parents, Germany was forced to confront the Nazi era.

As she explores Germany's struggle with its national myths, Paris draws an engaging profile of a man who has courageously recreated the history of a north German Jewish community, and revisits the controversies touched off by Daniel Goldhagen's book, Hitler's Willing Executioners, and by the 1985 Bitburg fiasco.

Paris, in dealing with the French, acknowledges that France meted out justice to the most visible pro-Nazi collaborators, but says it also passed a general amnesty so as to bury "the entire embarrassing business of 1940-44."

Of late, however, France has begun to address these troubling issues. "The gate of memory... has creaked open a little wider," she notes.

No fan of Goldhagen, Paris argues that he missed the essence of what Primo Levi called the "grey zone" of human affairs, the "foggy universe of mixed motives, conflicting emotions, personal priorities, reluctant choices, opportunism and accommodation, all wedded to self deception and denial."

Could the Allies have saved lives by bombing the gas chambers and the rail lines leading to the death camps? Against the backdrop of David Wyman's landmark work, The Abandonment of the Jews: Americans and the Holocaust, she touches on this emotionally incendiary topic.

Concluding Long Shadows, Paris claims that lies and inventions about history are bound to fail. Ordinary people will remember the past, even if pressed to "forget" it. The victims, as well as their children and grandchildren, will not let sleeping dogs lie.

For many years, Jewish Holocaust survivors remained virtually silent. Inevitably, this silence could not be contained.

Paris, rightly so, contends that accountability is the key to breaking the logjam entangling memory and denial.

"With accountability come facts about the past and possibly an acknowledgement of wrongdoing, but most important, accountability is a way of separating the ill-favoured past from the present and perhaps a stepping stone akin to justice."

She has taken Orwell's dictum to heart. Touché.

Current events spoil SIBS

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — SIBS is a critical, sometimes humorous, look at Jewish family life by two Jewish actors who publicly disavow that it is about their own lives.

But the 80-minute play is so real that a lot of their own experiences must have been the inspiration. It is unfortunate that SIBS, written and performed a year ago by Diane Flacks and Richard Greenblatt, was remounted by Tarragon Theatre at Buddies in Bad Times Theatre (until Nov. 12) at a time when the world at large is unfriendly to Israel.

The play is a collaborative effort by two Jewish artists who cast an honest and questioning eye on events inside and outside their families. With live percussive music by Rick Sachs between their many scenes, the two present flashbacks to their days as infants, pre-pubescent youngsters and teenagers who do the jitterbug and heavy metal dances.

In their recollections as they are growing up in their Jewish environment they refer to relations between Arabs and Jews. They also talk about Palestinian claims to Jerusalem.

Their references to Jews and Palestinians now bring an audience response that is not friendly to Jews. The media coverage of the events in the West Bank and Gaza has, no doubt, contributed to this response.

At one time, the sometimes painful evaluation of a Jewish sister and brother could be taken at face value as a contribution to honest debate, but not today. References to Palestinian demands on Jerusalem elicit objections from audience members who have not given enough attention to the Israeli situation.

The play starts with the siblings as adults, as the shivah for their widowed father ends. Diane is now living where her career has taken her, 400 miles away from their childhood home. Richard is in the midst of a marital crisis.

Richard is angered to learn that Diane is planning to leave the next day while "time sensitive" items relative to the estate remain to be done. Among other things, they have to deal with a gift of $25,000 their father has willed to Cherisse, his lover.

The scenes moving back-and-forth in time are a bit confusing, and the sight of a mustachioed and mature Richard crying in a crib with a soother is hard to believe. The scenes where the two talk as adults were meaningful to this reviewer, but those in which they scampered about the stage as children got the biggest response from the audience.

Brother and sister cover for each other when they come home drunk or drugged, or when they are smoking pot. Richard sniffs that his sister "is a keen environmentalist who uses 80 gallons of hot water a day."

SIBS is clearly a dark comedy.

Playwright regains confidence after bout with cancer

BY KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Adam Pettle's lifelong dream to act was shattered in his final year of acting studies at Dalhousie University in Nova Scotia.

Diagnosed with thyroid cancer at the age of 21, the surgery to remove a tumour damaged his left vocal chord affecting his voice and jeopardizing his future as an actor.

Instead of dwelling in self-pity, Pettle, now 27, helped his healing process by penning a play, Therac 25, a fictional love story drawn from his experience as a cancer patient at the old Princess Margaret Hospital.

Therac 25, named for his ward at the hospital, played at the Atlantic Fringe Festival and was produced in Toronto by Slide, a production company owned by Pettle and his older brother, Jordan, an actor and director. Therac 25 will be broadcast on CBC radio in November.

Pettle was recently offered a small part in the Canadian Stage Company's production Terry Johnson's Hysteria, currently on stage at the Bluma Appel Theatre at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts until Nov. 4.

Pettle plays two roles, a Holocust victim and a corpse. The latter, a memorable part because he appears nude in this drama that fictionalizes a meeting between Sigmund Freud and artist Salvador Dali in 1938.

"Basically the director needed someone thin who looked like a Holocaust victim. I had the look because my head is shaved. It is a great part time job for six weeks, I get money for a couple hours work at night." Pettle says.

During the day, the fully clothed playwright is putting the final touches on his latest offering, Sunday Father, which he hopes to develop with a workshop in January 2001. His play Zaidie's Shoes will make its Canadian premiere Jan. 4 at The Factory Theatre in Toronto. The cast includes brother, Jordan and seasoned stage actor Randy Hughson.

The cancer hit as Pettle was just finishing his studies at Dalhousie where he was majoring in theatre. He struggled – flying back and forth for treatment in Toronto to classes and performances in Halifax. Performing was difficult, as his voice was so weak from the surgery.

"It changed everything in my life, when I got sick. I had a hard time after getting out of the hospital to readjusting to the outside world." In time, Pettle's yearning to be part of the theatre scene was reborn. He enrolled at the National Theatre School of Canada - graduating from the playwriting program. "But now, I don't have the drive or the fire that needs to burn to get you on stage. I loved acting, but writing has become far more satisfying for me.

To see all of Adam Pettle in Hysteria, call the CanStage Box office at (416) 368-3110.

Business Profile

President pilots Palm in friendly Canadian waters

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In a lot of ways, Michael Moskowitz is a prototypical tech-savvy businessman of the Internet age. He's young, enthusiastic, he loves what he does and he "wakes up excited" about the prospect of building a business from the ground up.

A marketer and advertising specialist by training – as well as by inclination – these days Moskowitz is flogging the latest technological marvel that has taken Canada by storm, the Palm PDA. Personal Digital Assistants, those wallet-sized electronic gizmos that bridge the gap between laptop computers and electronic organizers, are better known by their brand names, in this case, the Palm.

Five years ago, US Robotics introduced the Palm Pilot, the granddaddy of the PDA market, offering core applications like an appointment organizer, address book, to do list and memo pad. The Palm Pilot was recently put to pasture in favour of newer and hipper products like the Palm Vx and the Palm IIIc, which offer extended features that make the device as much a portable computer as an organizer.

At 30, Moskowitz is the president and general manager of Palm Canada, a subsidiary of Palm Inc., the giant U.S. mother company. Palm Inc. had been spun off from 3Com, which in turn had acquired U.S. Robotics.

Like other famous brands before it – think of Kleenex, Saran Wrap – Palm Pilots and the more recent generation of Palm products have become synonymous with the product they represent. Far from being just a high-tech tchachkeh or toy, the Palm is quickly becoming a vital component in the corporate worker's toolbox and the gadget of choice for those who need to organize their schedules and phone lists. With a large number of attachments that expand the PDA's utility as well as an open technology that lets developers around the world write software for the device, users are finding new applications for the Palm all the time.

Sales people are using it to track inventory and record sales forecasts.With a modem attachment, it can be hooked up to the Internet to download e-mail, Web content, spreadsheets, faxes and photos. Get Moskowitz started, and his enthusiasm bubbles over about the revolutionary changes the device is wreaking in the business world.

"This is the Web in your pocket. Think about how powerful that is. Think about inventory on hand, purchase orders, sales tracking. That's powerful," he said.

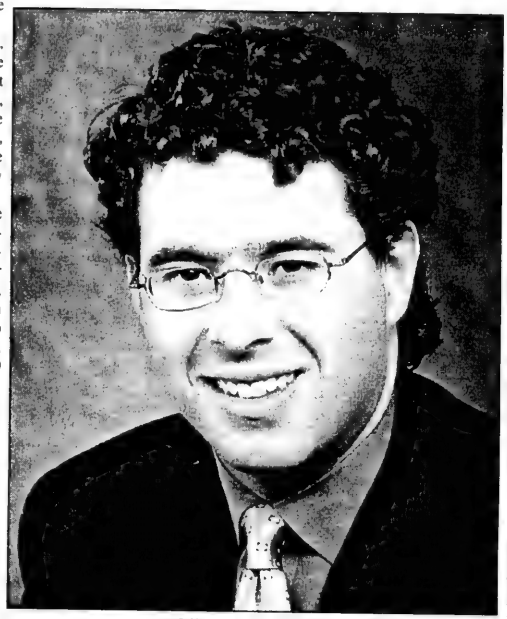
With a modem attachment, you can download up to five Web pages on the device (text only). With the new Palm VII, to be introduced to the Canadian market shortly, wireless Internet access will be available at the touch of a few buttons.

The Palm devices have proven so popular in the corporate world, Palm Canada regularly fills clients' orders for several hundred units at a time, even up to 1,000. Canadian consumers are also taking to the Palm in a big way. So far, sales of more than 600,000 units have generated approximately $130 million. "We joke that Canadians like anything the size of a hockey puck, but the fact is size, simplicity and functionality really does matter," Moskowitz said.

Globally, hand-held computer units are expected to hit sales of seven million in 2000 and grow to 18 million in 2004. Palm Inc. recently reported first quarter revenues of $401 million US, up 14 percent from the previous quarter and up 127 percent from the same quarter a year before. Its rival, Handspring Inc., reported fourth quarter revenue of $51.8 million US, up 51 percent from the previous quarter.

Palm owns about 86 percent of the Canadian market, eclipsing its domestic rivals and bettering the market share (72 percent) enjoyed by the parent company south of the border. The entry level Palm IIIe sells for around $229 while the high end monochrome Palm Vx goes for approximately $599.

When Moskowitz started at 3Com a little over three years ago, Palm Canada was merely a tiny division of the U.S. giant, a corporate backwater where gizmo-heads had developed a toy-like device that seemed to offer limited business potential.



Michael Moskowitz

"It was the jewel that grew up," Moskowitz said.

Three years ago, the device was so new, no one in retail knew what to make of it. It was tough to convince electronics store merchandizers to stock the Palm Pilot, he recalled.

"Some retailers absolutely didn't let us in the door," he said. "Can you imagine? It was a struggle to get Palm inside the door of some of the larger national retailers."

At the time, Palm did not fit neatly into any single category. "No one understood what it did. They thought it could be like an organizer, some of which had succeeded, others had not."

Moskowitz's most important task at the time was "to build the brand. We've done that in three to four years."

It entailed lots of marketing, advertising, in-store demonstrations and training sales people. "We tried to get people aware of the product," Moskowitz said.

He now predicts "the category will grow 100 percent a year for the next two years" as both consumer and corporate demand increases.

Although he seems a little on the young side for all the responsibilities he's assumed, Moskowitz has been training for his position for some time. After studying urban planning at York University, he obtained an MBA from Dalhousie University and then moved on to marketing and sales jobs at Sony and Sharp Electronics. At Sony, "I was given the opportunity to move around and gain experience," he said. "I was thrown in the fire many times. I said, 'I can do it, give me the opportunity.' It was a sink or swim experience."

Even before that, he gained lots of on-the-job training working for his father, Milton, the president of Eldon-Rubber Maid. The younger Moskowitz worked in the marketing department, did desktop publishing and helped with the company's computer system.

Up until two years ago, he also owned his own business, a donut kiosk at Dufferin Mall called Round Delights.

A native of Toronto, Moskowitz attended USDS before going on to A.Y. Jackson High School. While working as a counselor at Camp Shalom, he met his future wife, Shoshana Green. They have an infant daughter, Hannah.
